Will These Things Happen?

TWO social and political developments of importance to our cooperative marketing movement are closely linked together in the minds of some agricultural leaders. Both of them are trends which are well advanced and both are increasing in velocity. Each one in itself is significant but the combination of the two may be of even greater moment.

The first is the growing tendency toward co-operation. It has been evident in the past for several years, but it has been gaining in force at an increasing pace. The second is the tendency toward a nationalistic approach to agricultural marketing. This, too, has grown in significance in recent years, but it has been equally gaining ground.

Taken together, these two trends promise to produce a situation which will have far-reaching implications for the future of our farm organizations and the marketing system as a whole.

The Service the Farmer Requires

The farmer requires a service which will enable him to sell his products in a more efficient and economic manner than he can do it himself. This service must be provided by organizations which are not only efficient but also profiting equally from the sale of their products. The profits of the farmer should be shared with those who provide the service in order that the whole system may be self-sustaining and self-supporting.

The Government's Role

The government's role in this situation is to ensure that the service provided is of high quality and that it is available to all farmers on a fair and equitable basis. It must also take steps to prevent any concentration of power in the hands of a few large organizations. The government should ensure that the farmers' organizations are free to compete on a fair basis with other organizations.

Conclusion

The trends described above are of great importance for the future of our farm organizations and the marketing system as a whole. It is imperative that the farmer should be provided with a service which is both efficient and economic. The government must play a role in ensuring that this service is available to all farmers on a fair and equitable basis. The future of our farm organizations and the marketing system depends on the success of these trends.
