Russians Take Gomel, Drive Toward West

East German Stronghold East of Dnieper River Falls to Red Armies

LONDON, Nov. 26 — AP — Russia attacked the last Nazi stronghold east of the Dnieper, a covering around for a German army which was moving, some believe, to trap prisoners of war and to hold on to the Dnieper.

The Soviet offensive, according to a number of correspondents, was caught up in a whirlwind of lightning and smoke, with tanks marching ahead.

Yesterday, a British dispatch said the Red Army crossed the river. From Moscow, where the road is not a bridge, but a column of tanks, they nearly a mile away.

Early West

This was the news dispatch recorded by the Soviet Army from a five-hour battle in a new of the Soviet attack, as the Red windmill, which was an airfield, was a red and white flag was flying over its control tower. The news was sent by a telephone from a local station.

German counterattack

A German counterattack was reported to have kept the Russian attack from the Korsun.

The Red columns, on the German counterattacks, consisted of three divisions of the Korsun, and three of the Korsun-Azov troops.

101st Liberation

The Korsun-Azov was a magnificent, well-equipped, well-organized unit, with a long history of fighting in the years before the war. It was a newly formed unit, which had been brought into the fighting in the past two months.

The Korsun-Azov was composed of three divisions, each equipped with tanks and artillery.

The German counterattack was made in the morning, and after a few hours, the Red troops were pushed back to the Dnieper.

A few miles behind, German troops were reported to have crossed the river.

In the afternoon, the Red troops were reported to have crossed the river, and the German counterattack turned to dust.

Am I pumpkin?

Yes, I am a pumpkin. But I am not a vegetable. I am a fruit. And I am not just any fruit. I am a pumpkin. A pumpkin is a type of squash. It is a fruit because it has seeds inside it. And it is not just a fruit. It is a squash. A squash is a type of plant that grows in gardens. It is a type of vegetable. A vegetable is a food that comes from plants.

Counsellors Plan New Guidance System for Freshman Women

Following the lead of many prominent schools, an effort to create a new program to help freshmen students is being developed by the University of Michigan, according to Mr. W. W. Hartzell.

The new program for freshmen,, however, will be much different from the usual type of help that freshmen students have been given. The program will be designed to help freshmen students through the first year of college, providing them with specific guidance in choosing courses and majors.

No funds will be required for the first year, according to Mr. W. W. Hartzell. The program will be run by the University of Michigan, and a small staff of counselors will be employed to assist freshmen students.

The program will be modeled after similar programs in other colleges, and will be designed to help freshmen students adjust to college life and succeed academically.

Radio Head to Go to Meet
