Manners Denote Quality of Coeds

MICHIGAN State has never claimed to be a sophisticated college. However, it would seem that we could do with a few of the characteristics associated with sophistication.

With the passing of served meals in the dormitories, some culinary phases of dining etiquette, which none of us were taught in our childhood, have passed into oblivion.

Although our parents probably told us that if we did not like the food put before us, we should be quiet and order our food, their final words have made a habit of rating their dishes and gripping all through meal-time up to the degree of those around them.

Miss college women are capable of deciding for themselves whether or not they like a certain dish of food with which they have been served. And when the time comes, there are so many other things that could be discussed.

The mark of a well-bred person is the ability to carry on a pleasant dinner-table conversation for being congenial with everyone present, which means, who is interesting. Anyone who lives in a dorm knows well enough that conversations in the dorm are too often endless.

And many other evidences obvious in the dining room are things by which we are a group of coeds, however, which is no doubt subject to be checked and infected for that does not speak well of us as individuals or as a school.

THE WOMAN'S WORLD

PRESIDENT A. A. SELLERMAN

A SIMPLE way of serving food to a large group is to have the main dishes set out on a trolley and serve the food from it. This method is particularly useful when serving coffee, tea, and other beverages. The trolley can be loaded with the dishes and taken to the table or room where the food is to be served. This saves time and eliminates the need for moving the dishes from the kitchen to the serving area. It also allows for easy access to the dishes and makes it easier for people to help themselves. This method is especially useful for large gatherings, such as weddings, receptions, and banquets, where efficiency and convenience are important. With the trolley method, the food can be kept hot and fresh, and the presentation can be improved by carefully arranging the dishes on the trolley. Overall, this method is a practical and efficient way of serving food to a large group.
