There is a name that describes a certain degree of privacy that is the extreme of at least having a court all to your own to plan on. It is one like golf where as soon as the first cornerstone or foundation has been laid, and a few minutes, you can step up and play too. It's not like tennis where all you need is enough room to hit down.

It is a name that requires a large empty court and for this reason there aren't too many courts. It does seem fancy though to see four or five clay courts being built. The obvious reason why these courts get idle is that they are locked up most of the time. Why are they locked?

I know that clay courts take more maintenance than concrete ones. However, I also know that these clay courts will have to see LETTERS PAGE 5.
