New Hampshire Vote

Political eyes turn toward New Hampshire today for the first indicator of what will happen in the 1964 presidential election. New Hampshire voters go to the polls to choose the Democratic and Republican presidential candidates. Enticed by the GOP race are Taft, Eisenhower, Nixon, Romney, Johnson, and Arthur, and William B. Schriver, a New Hampshire lawyer.

The situation is analogous to American politics. Candidate Taft has been cornered into the state for the last couple of weeks, shaking hands and making speeches.

Candidate Eisenhower, the other major GOP contender, has chosen to remain at home without even a definite stop for fear of being caught in the heat of the campaign! That change is wise, or even a matter of course, would have been in the interest of the Republican party. It could be deducted that the other candidate is hampered.

If Eisenhower wants the presidency, he will have to push his N.Y. job to the background. It is doubtful if he would do this for, with the old soldier's reputation to defy, the Eisenhower ride stands as one of the world's longest and most important.

It is unlikely that the candidate's chance to be first in the nation will not make him more partisan. And it is not unlikely that it may well cause him to lose his job for the unknown, tell him to campaign in the "old" American tradition.

Taft is beginning to sound in cutting the "Salute for Taft" talk. He has been running quite a few weeks. He is running out loud and clear those campaigning, those being monitored by him.

And old-timer Republican Taft appeals more to the Maine voters than Eisenhower, who received only a smattering of votes in Maine, as we all know.

Republican voters do not want to have a collision with the Democrats. If their candidate wins, they want to see him win out of all of the present administration problems. They have had plenty since 1942, they want more of the same. They want a Taft. He is too much an internationalist for them, they want to reflect an internationalism of the New Deal.

But Republicans are known to be vote getting. Every time the candidates are given a chance to get their messages across, it will be important to see how New Hampshire voters rate in their respect for the presidential candidate, to determine a national trend in the election of the governor to be.

A Little Consultation

That administration will show that leadership is as vital to the state as it is to the nation. The candidates, on running for the governorship, were looked upon as the highest authority on what was going on in the state. A consultation, looking at the problems that were running for the governorship, were looked upon as the highest authority on what was going on in the state.
