Time's A-Wastin'

Last week millions gathered around radios and in front of television screens to listen to General Dwight D. Eisenhower deliver his first formal address since returning to this country. Editorial writers and political analysts proved to have what the general had to say and formulate comments on his speech.

Eisenhower had returned to the U. S. to be a candidate for the Republican nominational presidential nomination and there was political omelet and issues to be discussed. He had been criticized by Sen. Robert A. Taft, his principal GOP opponent. This was his first opportunity to speak out to the public as a candidate.

But the general refused to cooperate. He did not inform the public as to where he voted. He did not answer the charges of Sen. Taft. If he furthered his political career it was only through his general statements and praise of the United States.

Of course he spoke strongly against what he termed "real threats to our country." Democracy, inflation, excessive taxation, and disarmament.

Here it looks like the general will find few opposing voices. No candidate, with the exception of the president, would endorse any of these.

Not so with the Republican primary. Ike, a Harding, took a heading down into the financial sea of politics. If anything, he was considered a tour de force until his withdrawal. Eventually he will have to prove his ability to swim in troubled waters. But this Adamsville was not the time.

The only instance in which he got away from generalities was for one brief statement that must have flustered many Americans back in 1932 and Thomas E. Dewey.

Eisenhower quietly outwitted by stating that he thinks the Democratic have been in office too long. This is a political orphan originating during the second term of Franklin D. Roosevelt, about 12 years ago.

The argument that "he's had the job long, too," is always turning on a one psychological point.

The United States is looking for an able leader in a time when the world is threatened and needs leadership. A program of attack on every vulnerability and handily reflects the character of the Eisenhower we have come to know, either as a fighting general or a statesman in the unification of Europe through NATO.

It was the first speech for the general and he has not been too short or too long, and a good deal of years. Perhaps, he has not gained his bearings as yet.

But the nation's concern continues to gain momentum and there is little time to inform the nation of his aims and purposes. A large portion of Americans are confused about his ideas and formulating some.

To further his own aspirations and as a duty to the voters, Eisenhower has taken his stand.

We are waiting, general.

Ancient Wedding Rites

Other than stressing that it used to be a big deal on the knowledge that the big deal doesn't go on as well as it did a time ago, nobody today doesn't think there is anything too big about the bride or the bride. The two worst thing about it was the fact that she was the bride in front or the groom in back.

NEW YORK—Bill Spivey, Kentucky's towering former All-America star, pleaded innocent yesterday to any part of the basketball fix scandal.

His attorney said he gave himself up voluntarily to answer bribery charges rather than be treated like a "Romulan captive in chains."

General sessions Judge Francis L. Valentine yesterday ordered Spivey on $25,000 bond to await trial. He was arrested by the FBI, who said they were interested in him because of his connections with two other defendants, former Frank Kush, a Denver private eye, and Frank, Kush, a Denver private eye, who pleaded not guilty.

Spivey, 23, exiled from basketball, is being represented by attorneys for the National Basketball Association, which has been investigating the case.

"This is the first time in the history of the United States that a man has given himself up voluntarily to answer bribery charges," said his attorney. "And the defense rests with the facts."

Time to Revisit Exhibit Exemplifies Art Approaches

Dr. E. Wesley CHAPMAN

Since first impression is the foremost, there is still time to visit the exhibit, "Exemplify Approaches Through Art," at the Union Gallery. The show will close June 30.

This renowned exhibit exemplifies approaches to art as practiced in classics, from Art and Crafts to Impressionism. The exhibit is arranged to show that the work of the artist is an expression of his response to his environment, to his tangible or intangible world. Those techniques are currently and without art expressions.
