Smeared Campaigning

With less than two weeks to go until election day, the smear campaign is picking up steam and the political environment is heating up, with each side in the election trying to discredit the other. This is a common tactic used in political campaigns to gain an advantage over the opponent. The candidates are using negative ads and personal attacks to try to dissuade voters from supporting their opponent. It is important to remember that while political campaigns may be intense, they should not be characterized by personal attacks. Voters should focus on the candidates' policies and ideas, rather than the personal attacks. The purpose of political campaigns should be to inform voters and allow them to make an informed decision about whom to support. If you find yourself feeling frustrated or overwhelmed by the political climate, take a break and find a way to relax and rejuvenate. Remember that you can make a difference by registered to vote and casting your ballot on November 6th.
