Success for STUN?

What's that commotion about STUN? Is it that the AWS office where the students on the football tickets? Even when someone is in the office they rarely know about the working of STUN!

Or maybe that the owner of the book, for which you bought a card has lost school four terms ago? How about the fact that the person you contact doesn't have the book any longer?

Are these legitimate criticisms? What is lacking is the set up of STUN. "Student Tents, Ever and Now"?

STUN has a difficult time contacting persons to see if they own the books for which books have been filled out. If the students do not call in when they sell a book without a student knows that the book is no longer for sale.

Another problem is failure to register books by the student. The demand for books exceed the supply by a tremendous amount.

Correction is the only way to succeed for STUN. Final students have to register the books they desire to sell, second, they have to report back to office when they sell a book to someone without a card, and third, the students have to be interested in selling books.

Worthy Project

It might be a good idea for the A-Hay committee to give the editor of the University of Toronto Campus Collegian a free ticket to the game. In a column in his paper, the editor laments, the Student Council for suggesting that changes be brought into college dining.

As far as this here, it has been recommended that changes be introduced at Toronto because of the expense. Says the editor, "Council has made some ridiculous recommendations for the cost and this certainly helps them all. We certainly would take more than an set of Student Council to succeed in our free lunch school functions."

We wonder if a trip to MICH might enlighten him.
