Freedom

With FEPC

Last week the Michigan House of Representatives passed for the first time in its history an FEPC bill and sent it to the Senate.

In past years the Senate has opposed any bill only to use it as a House committee, due to the prevailing opposition of former Rep. Eugene Forb, who was chairman of the committee on civic affairs.

Last year, Bert decided not to seek re-election and the stage was set for favorable action in the House.

This year's fair employment bill differs little with others that have been proposed in the past.

The bill sets up a chain of action to enforce the principle that every man is entitled to equal treatment in being hired and fired.

It establishes a bipartisan commission of five members who will oversee the federal enforcement of the act. If passed, it is to this commission that all complaints about prejudicial treatment would be addressed.

After investigation by the commission, if the complaints have merit, the commission will seek by means of mediation to resolve the difficulty.

If mediation does not work, the commission may hold a hearing and may volunteers to force the two sides to agree.

If all other means fail, the commission may at a last resort go into court and obtain an injunction ordering those who are not representative themselves proceed under the law.

It has been pointed out that in the 12 states which now have FEPC legislation on their books, the vast majority of cases have been settled at the pre-cases level.

The Real Issues

By ART UNDERWOOD

State News Managing Editor

Michigan State University has never investigated the status of the student bodies in the states that have adopted the fair employment act.

The University has a most friendly attitude toward those institutions to the extent that it does not conflict with the current economic climate in the states of the nation.

It is generally believed that these institutions will benefit because of the increased cooperation which may be fostered by the new legislation.

There are however certain limitations to some of the desired names supported by the State Board.

Protection of an establishment's name, whether of individual ownership or of organization in Michigan is the object of the University to which the name is applied.

No business or corporation would be compelled to register the name of an establishment in another state unless it is likely to be taken as a trade name or is likely to cause confusion with the names of other institutions.

The State Board seeks to protect the good name of the University from the possibility of the name being misused.

The Board is also opposed to Michigan College of Literature and Science.

For any Michigan State University student body in the 116th name is protected.

These three changes should be satisfactory to all but a number of cases should be added to the list of establishments which may not be registered with the Michigan State University Board of Regents.

We are not in a position to name the various institutions which may be added, or the number of cases which may be added.

A tweak of minor injuries occurred during a February practice session, leaving several players out of the lineup for Saturday's game. Coaches have been cautious about pushing players too hard in training camps, and many coaches have opted to rest key performers during intrasquad scrimmages.

Detection of Minor Injuries

Several players were spotted limping or holding their arms during the practice session, indicating that they may have suffered minor injuries during the previous week. Coaches have been monitoring these injuries closely, and it's likely that some players will be benched for the upcoming game.

Impact on Team Chemistry

The injuries have disrupted the team's chemistry, as players who are normally starters are forced to sit out. This could have a cascading effect on the team's performance, as backup players may not be as effective as their counterparts.

Precautions and Recovery

Coaches have been taking extra precautions to ensure that players return to full strength before being brought back into the lineup. This includes rest, ice, and other recovery techniques to help players heal quickly.

Impact on Future Games

The injuries could also affect future games, as players who are injured now may be unavailable for the rest of the season. This could have a significant impact on the team's overall performance.

Overall Impact

The injuries have put a strain on the team, but coaches remain optimistic that they can overcome these challenges and emerge stronger in the long run. The team will continue to monitor the injuries closely and make adjustments as needed to stay competitive.
