Test Ban Needed Before
Treaty Is Too Late

L.E. Hill, author of a study for the U.S. Military Academy, urged a nuclear test ban when he was on campus recently.

He said there is an urgency to get some sort of settlement this year because several other countries may start nuclear testing.

Hill, noted that as the number of nuclear powers increases, the chances of a test ban grows more remote. A test ban treaty would have to be signed by the United Kingdom, China and France, the ambassador said.

China may not be aware of the dangers involved, but it appears that the U.S. and Russia are.

"This is why the test ban agreement is necessary this year," the ambassador said.

L.E. Hill isn't saying how he plans to bring about a test ban. More of the nuclear powers are willing to consider a ban, he said. They have been talking to Russia for precisely the reason for several years, he said.

"The American proposal and the exchange has come down to this: should the U.S. sign a test ban?"

Elaine Van Horn, a political scientist, has been studying the test ban issues in Great Britain for the past several years.

"The British government is interested in a test ban, but they are waiting to see the American proposals before they take any action on their own," Van Horn said.

In MSU's Caste System

One of the most unfair situations at MSU is the way freshmen are treated.

Those who are freshmen and have not attended a high school in Michigan are considered "untouchables." This is a violation of the American Constitution, which guarantees equal protection under the law.

We, the students of MSU, demand equal treatment for all students, regardless of their caste system.

"We're all living in a world of possibilities," the editors wrote. "But man, some people look at it all wrong."
