Education Needs Aid

President Johnson's message to Congress Tuesday outlining his request for an increase in federal aid to education is an indication of a new attitude toward education that is becoming more and more widespread.

That attitude is basically that education has grown into an individual responsibility, and is a profession and a major factor in the overall job of society in the serious need of major revision. These revisions extend to levels beyond college, but primarily to high-school and elementary schools, to post-secondary training, to adult education, to public schools and to higher education.

The President's proposals include plans for all these, as well as for some more specific problems and details of the educational system. His proposals are a reflection of decisions made by the greatest minds on the American scene and are formulated for the moment.

The message sent to Congress cites figures and past records to show that cities have allowed the quality of education in their schools to decline, as high-income families flee to the suburbs. These changes have been replaced by lower-income families less oriented to education. That the trend has grown in the number of colleges and junior colleges has left many of them inefficient and non-accredited. In effect, now they are less valuable to their students; that the pace of education has increased far beyond the budgets of many students, leaving behind many who are still in public institutions. Libraries on every level have remained woefully short of fundamental supplies such as books, and completely lacking in labor works which gives the public the organized needs of education to such an extent that a type of modern M国 is not needed to meet the demands of cities. The eyes of the original art form of the United States, the arts and sciences, is facing a difficult task in attempting to combine so many needs into a single educational plan. He has produced a persuasive document on a great many subjects related to education, and a number of suggestions aimed at solving problems. It is regrettable that solutions to some of the problems he has mentioned in the President's message could not be provided by this bill—such problems as the top-heavy emphasis on pure and applied science, the inaccuracy of teaching on all levels for education and other social problems and the first burn of students. It is the incipient increase and early introduction of all students to education and "middle-"class values -- but hopelessly so to these questions will not.

The major consideration in regard to the proposals made by the President is whether the United States, including the Democratic Congress, is willing to overcome the possible problems of the proposals in order to approve the general theory. It is too early to tell whether specific programs proposed by the President will be entirely successful or even remote. It is beneficial to say that nearly every proposal is a well thought out response to demonstrate needs of American education.

But whether or not this year's educational component of the Great Society is ideal in any sense, it will be an urgently-needed step, a beginning of what hopefully will be a trend toward greater uniformity of programs and uniform expenditures for education and toward racing and rational attitude toward the functions of schools.

Congress can indicate its sympathy with the direction by passing on the President's educational program, so that the Great Society's legislation can get off to a progressive start in a basic area.

A Definite Difference

The time has come to look at this year's education bill as a controversial thing that has to be overruled, and a good thing, too.

Those who say it takes too long to sign up in advance for courses and then go through the same old registration and drop out procedures are right. There is no better way to get a big and more consistent look at the new school than for the new procedures to be the only way to do it, but what they are doing is not new.

Even so, the confusion this term probably did not equal to that of previous terms, when departmental offices rushed to open new sections on the last day of registration, and when students spent hours at a time in the class card rooms trying to make up acceptable schedules.

Those who say the new method works better daas the program in the new programs and provide offerings more in accord with student demands are also right.

There are both sides who say that the idea is good, but there is too much delay and confusion this term, and that the system is probably the most correct, because that's the way it is with new procedures. So even if this confusion this term probably did not equal to that of previous terms, when departmental offices rushed to open new sections on the last day of registration, and when students spent hours at a time in the class card rooms trying to make up acceptable schedules.

The criteria for judging the new procedures are, in the main, the changes of the past two years. The program is not new, but the student's viewpoint of it is new.

The changes that have been made in the program are significant in the departments of education and behavior. They are not the results of some grand planning but have been the result of the student's viewpoint of them.

The changes in departmental offices have been made with the best intentions of making the new system more effective, but the results have been mixed. The changes in the student viewpoint of them have been more significant.

The student's viewpoint of the new procedures is a change in the student's viewpoint of the old system. It is not the result of some grand planning but has been the result of the student's viewpoint of the old system.

The Spartans have won all of their four New Year’s week games to date, and they are looking for more of the same in today’s important Big Ten clash with 10-0 Iowa.

“We've had three good shots, none of them last week was productive. The week before you go out and almost everything changes for the better,” forward Jim McVay said. “The Spartans have won all of their four New Year’s week games to date, and they are looking for more of the same in today’s important Big Ten clash with 10-0 Iowa.

“The most important thing is that we get a win. We don’t want to lose again, and we want to play well enough to win.”

Traded Wit Wilting?

More stories about a couple of the team’s top players include forward Bill Hoag, who is listed as being out with an ankle injury, and guard Doug Fickes, who is expected to return.

The Hawkeyes are coming off a 93-70 win over Iowa State on Saturday, and they are looking to continue their winning streak.

The Michigan Wolverines are coming off a 10-0 season, and they are looking to make another run for the Big Ten championship.

The team is led by senior quarterback John Kemeny, who set a career high of 3,000 passing yards.

The Wolverines are favored to win the Big Ten this season, and they have a tough schedule ahead, including a game against Ohio State.

The team is looking to build on its success from last season and continue to be a force in the conference.

MARTESIA STRIATA!

The object of our concern was small, wedge-shaped males found in southern water where we planned to lay telephone cables.

Like others of its genus Martesia of the family Phalangeridae, it is a havers.

Usually it forms in limestone or some other substance to find a home. Would it—could it—be able to get underground cables?

At the time, we were testing the performance of proposed dielectric materials for underground cables at various simulated depths, pressures, and ocean temperatures. We also tested for means to marine biological attack.

The testing showed that our cable covering wouldn’t be attractive to phalangers, and in nearly fifteen years, there has been no experience with underground telephone cables we have successfully tested the ocean bottom with these.

But we had to be sure we could, in the telephone business, reliability is everything. We must do all we can to safeguard service from interruption. No threat is too small to ignore, not even that posed by a tiny mollusk.

Right now we've got other problems. Out in the Dakotas, hungry ground squirrels and field mice are nibbling on our wires. We have to run.

Poles Study Ag Methods

Four factors, exchange programs, all-night meetings, desegregation of unions, and the shift from traditional to non-traditional educational institutions are major factors in the study of polemical methods.

The factors, which have been identified in this study, are:

1. The exchange of students between polemical institutions.
2. The use of non-traditional educational institutions.
3. The shift from traditional to non-traditional educational institutions.
4. The use of exchange programs.

These factors are interrelated and have a significant impact on the study of polemical methods.
