Black Majority Rule Remains Inevitable

THE RHODESIAN DECLARATION of independence was cloaked in language similar to that used in British South Africa. In attempting the similarity with Africa, the Rhodesian Movement has not been consonant with the African realities. The Rhodesian document demanded the right of the white settler in Rhodesia to remain in the white community. "\n

Apartheid Said Economic Necessity

By BILL Pritchard

State News Staff Writer

Without a doubt, whites, South Africa's ruling party, will continue to rule over a 25-year-old regime in South Africa, according to John Tabora, president-in-exile of the African National Congress. The country is crammed with black and white farmers, who are working together to build the economic structure that will support the regime's apartheid policy.

Tabora said that the South African government is committed to preserving its apartheid policy and using its resources to fight against any movement that seeks to change the status quo. The government has imposed several economic sanctions on the black population, including restrictions on education and employment opportunities. These sanctions have been imposed as a means of maintaining the supremacy of the white race and ensuring the continued existence of the apartheid regime.

According to Tabora, the black population is being systematically dehumanized and taxed, and has no chance of achieving anything but poverty and ignorance. The apartheid regime is not interested in providing quality education and economic opportunities to the black population, and any attempts to change this status quo will be met with severe resistance.

Therefore, indigenous labor is desperately needed. To keep the blacks employed enough to produce all the capital equipment and raw material that the country must export, the blacks must acquire the skills and knowledge needed to operate the factories and workshops. But the depression of the African workers has often been accompanied by the white workers, who in some cases have been paid less than they were before the war. They have had to work longer hours and have had to accept lower wages to maintain their standard of living. The African workers have also resorted to strikes to improve their working conditions and to demand higher wages.

The government has opposed the demands of the African workers, and the workers have had to resort to other means to improve their working conditions. The one commitment the signers of the UN charter made was not to settle international disputes by force or the threat of force, but through the United Nations. They knew that the United Nations would be a new and better forum for international relations, a place where nations could come together to discuss and resolve their differences peacefully. The United Nations was founded on the idea that collective action could prevent wars, and that international cooperation was essential for peace and prosperity.

The United Nations Charter was signed in 1945 by representatives of 51 countries. It established the UN as a permanent international organization with the goal of maintaining international peace and security, promoting human rights, and encouraging economic and social progress. The UN has since grown to include 193 member states, and its membership continues to expand as new countries are admitted.

The UN has many important roles and responsibilities, including promoting sustainable development, providing humanitarian assistance, and addressing global challenges such as climate change and nuclear non-proliferation. The UN is an important forum for international cooperation, and its work is guided by the principles of sovereignty, equality, and self-determination.

Today, more than 75 years after its founding, the UN remains committed to the same goals and principles that were established in 1945. The UN continues to be a vital institution in the global community, working to promote peace, security, and prosperity for all people around the world.
