Congressmen's Actions Reflect Age Of Hypocrisy

The House of Representatives' recent handling of the 1965 Civil Rights Bill illustrates an age-old dilemma: How can one be fully supportive of a bill that contains so many elements to which one is opposed? When passed in its original form, the bill was a threat to the political structure and white dominance in the South. But last Wednesday the House came as near as it is likely ever to come to voting down an essentially non-discriminatory measure by a vote of 313 to 107. What's more, 293 of those who voted Yes were against everything that was said to be in the bill. The bill provides for federal registration of voters to take place in counties where percentages of the voting age population are 20 per cent or less. If passed, the effect of the proposed legislation will be to bring about an increase in the number of Negro citizens who are qualified to vote. This, of course, is a threat to white supremacy. White supremacy is an economic and social system that has been able to maintain itself by a combination of the most ruthless violence and the most subtle manipulation of the law. The bill's opponents seem to be divided into two groups: Those who oppose it because they know that it will lead to an increase in the number of Negro citizens who are qualified to vote, and those who oppose it because they know that it will lead to an increase in the number of Negro citizens who are qualified to vote.

The House's actions in voting against the Civil Rights Bill represent a marked change in the political climate. The bill's opponents are no longer content to sit back and watch as the bill passes through Congress. They are actively working to prevent its passage, and they are doing so with a vigor that is unprecedented. This change in the political climate is a result of the growing awareness of the need for civil rights legislation. The bill is not only a threat to white supremacy, but it is also a step towards equality and justice for all Americans. New Graduate Library
Given A 'Ton Of Life'

By DOROTHY LAKEY
State News Staff Writer

The new graduate library was presented with a magazine collection of nearly a "ton of Life" Friday afternoon, in honor of the university's 100th anniversary.

The collection includes more than 1,000 issues of the popular magazine, dating from the 1930s to the present. The gift was presented by publisher Henry C. Koch, who said the collection is valued in the millions of dollars.

The collection was presented to MSU students in commemoration of the university's centennial, he said.

"The gift was intended to recognize the university's role in the development of Life magazine, which was founded in 1936," Koch said.

The magazine began publishing in 1936, and has been a staple in American homes ever since. It is known for its high-quality photography and in-depth reporting on a wide range of topics.

The collection includes issues from the early days of the magazine, as well as more recent ones. It features articles on a variety of subjects, including politics, culture, entertainment, and sports.

The gift was presented to the university's library in October, and is now housed in a special storage facility on campus.

"We are honored to receive such a significant gift," said University Library Director David Wilcox.

"This collection will be an invaluable resource for students and faculty alike. It will help us to better understand the history and culture of our time."
