Election outcome uncertain in Huber-Romney primary

By JEFF SHELTER
State News Staff Writer

Those who say the Huber-Romney primary is "purely symbolic" fail to appreciate the reality of the Republican presidential primary race. Republican voters in the state of Michigan will cast their ballots on Tuesday, but the outcome is far from certain.

When state Republican leaders picked Lemon as the "party's choice" for a U.S. Senate seat, Huber offered a different perspective. He believes that the primary is important, not just because it will determine the outcome of the race, but also because it will provide valuable information about the electorate.

"The primary is a chance to test the waters and gauge the support for each candidate," Huber said. "It's a way to see how we're doing and what we need to work on.""

Huber's comments come as the Republican party is facing a crucial moment in its history. The party is divided over how to address the issues of the day, and the primary is seen as an opportunity to determine the direction of the party.

"We need to find a way to bring together the different factions of the party," Huber said. "We need to find a way to address the concerns of all our voters.""
Radio 'spots' to urge war's end

BY JEANNE SADLER

Radio spot announcements urging an end to the war in Vietnam will be broadcast in the Lansing area soon. As part of the American Red Cross nationwide "Americans for Peace," the announcements will be distributed in 50 communities, including Lansing.

Two members of the group's board of directors, Tom Collins and B. Parker, formerly worked for the Empire McClain advertising agency in Grand Rapids.

Collins said the Red Cross felt it was necessary to start the campaign. Collins and Parker worked in Grand Rapids.

The only member of the board of directors in the Lansing area, and Lansing will be used as one of two or three pilot cities for the radio and television spots. The idea is for a student volunteer interested in the peace campaign to handle the spot.

If successful, "Statements for Peace" will go national on a national scale. Locally, the announcements will be based on "A man's movement." Parker said there are two major ideas involved in the campaign: to make the radio announcements self-supporting and to test the effectiveness of such a method. The group plans to take a poll of attitudes of the listeners before and after their campaign.

The group has already raised $300 for its first contributions.

Tony Rondali, author, and Joseph Diller, author of "Give Us Peace," are among the sponsors of the Red Cross drive. Other sponsors include Harald Service, WJR's "World of Sports" program manager, and Gordon Stone, Lansing attorney.

Parker said they do not endorse any particular religion or political party. The group wants to reach all veterans, peace leaders, and interest groups. The latter group supports the peace movement.

President George Pacheco Anoor maintained his "pacifist" credentials with comments that the nation's government might grant a general amnesty to those who have conscripted to military service.

Police continued their search for Dan A. Byrnes, a former Richmond, Ind., police chief working for the AMU for International Development, and his girlfriend, Cheryl Aymes Batts Demigana.

Local plans hampered military targets in Egypt and Syria on Sunday and Israeli and Jordan pixels dotted Arab soil on the southeast shore of Lebanon in another round of the Middle East conflict.

Drug center seeks funds

By ROBERTA SMITH State News Staff Writer

The Lansing Drug Education Center, as both an educational center and a medical advice center, is seeking funds to continue its operation. The center, located in a small building on the campus of Michigan State University, provides free medical advice to anyone who seeks it.

The center was started by a group of students who became concerned about the growing problem of drug abuse on campus. They decided to open a center to help students and others who might be struggling with drug-related issues.

The center offers a variety of services, including counseling, education, and medical advice. It also provides a safe and confidential place for people to seek help without fear of judgment.

The center is staffed by volunteers, including students, faculty, and community members. It is open every Monday from 4 to 8 p.m. and is open by appointment on other days.

The center relies on donations and grants to fund its operation. If you would like to support the center, you can make a contribution online at their website or by mailing a check to the center's address.

Thank you for your support of the Lansing Drug Education Center. Together, we can make a difference in the lives of those affected by drug abuse.

INTERRACIAL MARRIAGE

Wedding ends court fight

JACKSON, Miss. (AP) - "We're nearly two people in love," said Roger Mills, a white man and Mrs. G. E. Jackson, a Negro woman, Sunday in a 24-year-old black woman, ending a re-battle against the state's anti-miscegenation laws.

The formal church wedding of Mills, 24, and Mrs. Jackson, a 25-year-old Negro school teacher, was attended by some 200 guests.

"It's nothing new," said Mills, a native of Jackson, after the ceremony in St. James Methodist Church Sunday. The couple had been married nine years, but this is the first time in the State of Mississippi ever officially sanctified it.

Their appearance at a marriage bureau two weeks ago was blocked by a state court injunction secured by the Southern National party, which continued the marriage trial to the Supreme Court. The district court judge permitted the marriage to take place on the condition that the license issued on Friday before the clerk's office closed for the weekend.

"We wanted a quiet wedding but the Southern National party made sure it wasn't," said Mills, who was standing in line with his wife.

The Rev. E.M. Furrer of Greenville, Miss., performed the ceremony at the Jackson church and said he found the couple were an example for the world to follow.

"You come from two different worlds, but you are going out in a united world together.

Traffic ban reduces noise

Traffic noise across the United States has dropped by more than 15 million people in the last 10 years, according to a new study by the National Environmental Protection Agency.

The report found that traffic noise in the nation's 50 largest cities has decreased by more than 20% since 1990.

The study is based on data collected from more than 1,000 locations across the country, including freeways, highways, and city streets.

Traffic noise has been shown to have a number of negative health effects, including increased stress, sleep disturbances, and cardiovascular problems.

The report also found that traffic noise is highest in urban areas, where it can be caused by high-speed traffic, heavy trucks, and other sources.

The study recommends that cities take steps to reduce traffic noise, such as improving road surfaces, increasing green space, and encouraging the use of public transportation.

The report also suggests that more research be done on the effects of traffic noise on children, who are particularly vulnerable to its effects.

Traffic noise is a growing problem in many countries around the world, and the study's findings are expected to be used by policymakers as they work to address the issue.

The study was conducted by the National Environmental Protection Agency and the University of California, Berkeley.
