Commission urges seating of Communist China in UN

WASHINGTON (AP) — A presidential commission whichviews membership in the United Nations as a "basic democratic right," strongly urged the United States to invite the People's Republic of China to the UN as a full and equal member. A report from the commission, which is headed by President Nixon's special aide, Henry Kissinger, was released in New York on Tuesday.

The commission, headed by Kissinger, was formed several months ago at the request of President Nixon to study the question of China's participation in the UN. The commission was assisted by the Institute for International Relations at Columbia University.

The report was released at a time when President Nixon is expected to announce a major change in U.S. policy toward China. The United States and China have been at odds for nearly two decades over the question of membership in the UN.

The commission's report is expected to be a major factor in the decision of the United States regarding China's membership in the UN.

Many students wishing to select a non-black name are being fed with the name "Tom." This is a pattern called "Tom's" of black names. Names such as "John" and "Mike" are examples of black names.

Many blacks reject American surnames. There are many reasons for this. One reason is that black names have a different meaning and sound from white names. Black names are often associated with slavery and terrorism. Black names are said to be "dehumanizing." Black names are also said to be "offensive." Many blacks believe that their names should be changed to black names that are not considered "dehumanizing" and "offensive."

Agnew a blind referee in ping-pong diplomacy

Harry Truman was proof to American two decades ago that any citizen can become President. Vice-President Hubert H. Humphrey today he that a rational perception of international and domestic issues is a necessary qualification for either, including Vice-President. Humphrey's recent appearance with reporters at the GOP governor's conference at Williamson, Ill., last week indicated that his views on China's being unit stop, then China knows that its once strong foreign policies have been dented, and it is certainly prepared to afford to have two more great enemies at the same time. Under Chou En-lai, the Chinese have established a self-imposed diplomatic isolation, in expanding foreign trade and in general getting ready to take its rightful place as a world power.

According to Agnew, our liberal friends in the U.S. might disbelieve the Taiwan position. We also alleged that we were reporting talent in China's favor helped Chou En-lai win a propaganda battle.

Agnew, it appears, is more willing to support the anti-Communist, so unwilling to change China's stand in the face of Chinese changes. It makes the call of U.S. officials toward changing Chinese policies toward vast strategic relations highly difficult to implement, particularly if U.S. officials agree with Agnew's criticism of relaxed relations in China.

The move by Chinese officials on the o'clock shadow. Either the whole lot of Chinese officials are wrong or Agnew is.

Agnew is seeing a rapid change in the Chinese regime.

Some observers believe Agnew's "Ping-Pong" reports were part of a Chinese strategy to keep the United States on the defensive. They believe that Agnew's preparation on the U.S. to switch its attention from the administration and the United States as well. Government officials of the world are working to keep sight of hope and hopefully monitoring what Chinese officials are doing in dealing with the United States.

What does or does not occur in the new decade will depend on how the decade of the 1970's will be perceived. The decade of the 1970's was a period when the university of Michigan was in many ways a mecca for political dissent. But much has happened during the last decade that those involved had very little time to evaluate what they did. Crisis, either of form or function, continues. Thus, the decade should be reviewed to see what can be learned from the events that took place in the last decade.

Briefly, the beginning of the 1970's were a time of new energies and black movements. Some of these energies were positive, while others were negative. The positive ones were those that sought to create meaningful educational opportunity programs. The negative ones were those that sought to destroy the educational establishment. The decade is best remembered as a time of social change, whether or not one approves of the policies of the current administration or not.

The beginning of the decade was marked by a wave of student activism. This wave of student activism was characterized by the general goals and objectives that would later be used by the New Left to define its meeting, a spokesmen said.

MTU prof cites reasons for U.S. poverty problem

by S. FREDERICK

Fun much emphasis on education and a focus on the job problem are key opportunities programs at Michigan State University that exist today, the President said.

The University's new President has a relative poverty problem.

The range of incomes has been less than 1.5. A poverty index is shown in the last column of the table above.

In Michigan, more than half of the white income was used for housing. The white income charged in Michigan was estimated to be $10.00. A poverty index of 3.00 was estimated to be a reasonable index for the state. A poverty index of 3.00 was estimated to be the best estimate of the state poverty index.

Traylor said that the equal opportunity programs for the black people in Michigan were not as completely effective as the equal opportunity programs for the white people in Michigan. He said that the equal opportunity programs for the black people in Michigan were not as completely effective as the equal opportunity programs for the white people in Michigan.

A recent study of the Negroes in the state of Michigan indicated that the Negroes in the state of Michigan were not as completely effective as the equal opportunity programs for the white people in Michigan. Bishops discuss celibacy at semiannual conference

DETROIT (AP) - The Roman Catholic Church's ban on priests having marriage has been put aside temporarily by the church's American bishops for the first time.

"It has been a question in limbo up to now," said Bishop John J. Stoll, of San Francisco. The church's third president, Mt. St. Mary's, Calif., and Monday. "Now it's in the open. If we're going to tackle credibility with our priests, we have to face it head on.

As the approximately 210 bishops gathered for their semiannual meeting, starting today, there was no possibility that they could reach a "preliminary" solution, in any event, on whether to advocate a change. What brought the matter to the head was the Pope's recent pronouncement in favor of clerical celibacy, and then efforts by various countries to deal with the problem of shortage of priests in the U.S.

New reports from 11 of the regions of the U.S., and from foreign countries, have been dealt with by the Vatican, and the missionaries are being evangelized to the countries of the world.

"The idea of celibacy is an idea of the National Catholic welfare organization, but we have to face the fact that we are going to need priests to minister to the people," said Bishop Stoll.

As the bishops gathered, they were faced with the reality that the number of priests in the world is decreasing, and that the number of candidates for the priesthood is also decreasing. The bishops are now facing the challenge of finding ways to attract more men to the priesthood and to provide better support for those already in the ministry.
