Financial aid aimed at low income students

By BILL McLELLAN
State News Staff Writer

More qualified students are applying for financial aid from the University than has been available in the past, Harry C. Dykema, director of financial aid, said Tuesday.

For a number of reasons, lesser income students in need of financial aid are turning toward local programs from banks and financial agencies while the University is concentrating on the more affluent students, Dykema said.

"The pressure has been placed on all universities to enroll students from the lower income groups," he said. "The federal programs are really stipulating to do lower income people." Dykema and Educational Opportunity Grant (EOG) and the Work-study people, in particular, are programs where the money has gone into people from outside the University.

"We have been emphasizing to the students that the first step in applying for aid is to talk to the aid office at the University," he added.

Michigan State has "double-tested" about 300 of the more affluent students. "Our goal is to get more money distributed at one individual and you will have less to be concerned about," Dykema said.

"We can't help these people as we have to refer them to those agencies," he added.

But Dykema said the midwest income group is "up to the elbows" and is紧迫 to find programs for reasons in addition to assistance provided by the University and the government on the state level.

The general remark is that there are not enough programs, and the income group in the midwest is "bumping into" the Federal programs.

"You have a program available for the student but they don't know who to see about it," he said. "In comparison, the student in the high-income group has been moved out of that area, and they are in a much better position.

"We used to have a very broad student mix, but more and more the student mix is narrowing," he added.

"The majority of people are having a tough time," Dykema said. "We can't solve the problem, but we can help people solve the problem, that's all we can do in the University."
"Sky: soggy sentimentality"

In spite of all the signs that are given, emotions that are generated, and the feelings that exist in "Red Sky at Morning," nothing comes to be. The film, an example of soggy sentimentality, fails to be calculated and least forgivable. It was neither easy nor

Another question center on whether campus radio stations should follow equal opportunity requirements relating to political programming, personal attacks and the like. Several students on campus believe there should be a revision of the FCC's equal opportunity requirements so that radio stations which come under the FCC's jurisdiction do not have to follow the same rules as do television stations. This is because of the financial problems that some campus radio stations have. It was suggested that there should be a separate FCC rule for college radio stations so that they would not have to follow the same rules as television stations.

The question of whether to have a policy to prevent political advertising was raised by several students. They said that it would be unfair to have a policy that prevented some political advertising while allowing other forms of advertising.

This question was also raised by several students who said that the FCC's equal opportunity requirements were too restrictive and that they should be relaxed.

On the other hand, some students feel that the FCC's equal opportunity requirements are necessary to prevent political advertising and that they should be maintained.

Another question was whether the FCC should require radio stations to have a financial plan for the future. Several students said that this would be impractical and would only add to the financial problems of radio stations. Others felt that it was necessary to ensure that radio stations would be able to continue operating in the future.

The question of whether radio stations should be required to have a certain amount of advertising time each day was also raised. Some students said that this would not be necessary and that the FCC should leave advertising to the discretion of radio stations. Others felt that it was necessary to ensure that radio stations would be able to continue operating in the future.

The question of whether the FCC should require radio stations to have a certain amount of programming time each day was also raised. Some students said that this would not be necessary and that the FCC should leave programming to the discretion of radio stations. Others felt that it was necessary to ensure that radio stations would be able to continue operating in the future.
