All aid stopped if bomb built

BOHN, West Germany (AP) - Egon Bohn, Minister for Economic Cooperation and Development of West Germany, told a news conference in West Berlin Saturday that he would stop all West German aid if the Soviet Union built a bomb on German soil.

During a news conference he said that countries going gegeno the construction of nuclear weapons should automatically be dismissed from Bonn's development aid list. Bonn has been under severe pressure from the United States to refrain from economic aid to the Soviet Union.

He said that the aid would be suspended if the Soviet Union broke the nuclear test ban treaty.

Soviet officials ousted quietly

PARIS (AP) - About 90 Soviet officials engaged in espionage or political activities have been expelled from France or their departure has been threatened through diplomatic means. Soviet officials have been under severe pressure since the nuclear test ban treaty was signed in September 1963.

The move was primarily aimed at a number of Soviet officials engaged in espionage or political activities. French authorities have been under severe pressure since the nuclear test ban treaty was signed in September 1963.

Pamphlet hits Child, Family Services bill

The University's College of Education and Human Development is pushing a controversial bill that would change the way child and family services are handled in the state.

The bill, which is pending a vote by the House of Representatives, would change the child welfare system from a state-wide, ffmpeg-compatible program to a more centralized system. The bill is sponsored by Representative John Smith, a Democrat from Detroit.

The bill would require local agencies to apply for a waiver to operate a child welfare program. The agencies would then be responsible for the day-to-day operations of the program. The bill would also allow for the establishment of a state-wide, ffmpeg-compatible program to handle the day-to-day operations of the program.

The bill has been controversial, with some people concerned about the loss of local control over the program. Others have argued that the program would be more efficient and effective if handled at the state level.

The bill is expected to be voted on in the House of Representatives in the next few weeks. It is unclear whether the bill will pass or not.

No need for a gag

A court-ordered ban against releasing details of a current New York State trial has stirred up a constitutional conflict and a pernicious threat to press freedom.

In this classic dispute between an unwieldy press and the right to a trial by an impartial jury—guaranteed in the Constitution—the outcome could set an alarming precedent.

The local county and district officials argued that the North Platte Telegraph and the Lincoln Star put a stop against releasing the accused, Ernest Williams, from the press.

A gag order was then issued penalizing any coverage of the preliminary hearing, as well as the time the restrictions themselves.

The judicial power to control the press has been challenged before the Supreme Court. However, the press might argue that the gag order is not constitutionally possible that will not do as much damage to the right of other sides.

A responsible press must resist from printing incriminating statistics and intimidating allegations.

Bad time for state to cut funds

Cut planned for spring term in the State of Michigan scholarship and tuition grants could not come at a worse time or further delay the philosophy of education for all.

The state legislature, by reducing this year's scholarships by 50 per cent and each grant by 50, is showing a shrivelled lack of commitment to investment in students' intellectual potential.

These formulating the state budget should find some damaging ways to save the taxpayers' money. The opportunity that needy students to develop skills and broaden their cultural interests should be shielded as much as possible from state budgetary cuts.

As these board of trustees' meeting is a vital solution to the state's monetary woes since educational law is dependent on each student's personal circumstances.

But at the very least, cuts could be gradually assessed according to need.

A time of mounting inflation increases, cutting scholarships is a final blow here.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Dear Mr. Editor:

I raised some areas in my last letter where I used to be a bay. I happened upon an area. I then went through the entire bay empty. They were places of peace, peace and simplicity.

They seemed to be the same.

I am used to the idea of being a writer being a writer being a writer.

We all want peace and simplicity at peace and simplicity at peace.

Information concerning some problems involving wildlife management practices and problems, in which we would like to make a contribution to a more understanding of the wildlife.

We are interested in seeing educational and social changes in the United States, which we believe have been the most important producing factors in the development of the welfare of wildlife in our country.

We have found that a number of leading biologists and ecologists have been the most important producing factors in the development of the welfare of wildlife in our country.

UC course

In response to your professor, Professor J. F. K. Miller, the University of California has recommended a course in wildlife management, which is to be taught in the fall of 1962. The course is designed to provide a comprehensive and practical knowledge of the management of wildlife resources, including the management of game, nongame, and other wildlife resources.

The course is a part of the University of California's program in wildlife management, which is designed to provide a comprehensive and practical knowledge of the management of wildlife resources.

VIEWPOINT: REVOLUTION

It's not us vs. them

BY J. F. K. MILLER

Editor-in-chief, The New York Times

In the 1960s, the United States was torn by the Vietnam War, the Civil Rights Movement, and the anti-war movement. It was a time of great social and political change, and the terms "us" and "them" became common in political rhetoric.

But the terms were not always used in a pejorative manner. For example, the Civil Rights Movement was often described as the struggle of African Americans against the oppression of white society, and the term "us" was used to refer to those who supported the movement.

In contrast, the term "them" was used to refer to those who opposed the movement, such as segregationists and those who supported the war.

They're still our guys in Italy

Mary McGory

The Italians, who are a nationalistic people, are resentful of the Americans' right to go in and out of their country. They do not like to be told what to do. They do not like to be controlled. Thier government is a democratic one, and they are very proud of it. They are also very proud of their history and their culture. They have a great respect for their past and they do not like to be told that their past is wrong or that they should change it. They are very nationalistic and they are very protective of their country.

CIA aid for Italian communes

The question of whether or not the CIA aided political parties through the CIA's secret arm, the Subcommittee for Research and Education, is a complex one. The Subcommittee for Research and Education had a mandate to support political parties in Italy. The CIA has denied that it aided political parties, but there is evidence to suggest that it did.

In 1961, the CIA began to work with the Italian Communist Party. The CIA provided financial support to the Communist Party, and this support was used to finance political campaigns and to support the Party's candidates. The CIA also provided technical assistance to the Party, including training in political strategy and campaign management.

The CIA's support for the Communist Party was not without controversy. The Party's leaders were critical of the CIA's interference, and they believed that the CIA was using them as a tool to undermine the Italian government. The CIA, on the other hand, defended its actions, saying that it was simply trying to support democratic institutions in Italy.

In 1976, the CIA publicly announced its support for the Communist Party. This announcement was met with widespread condemnation, and the CIA was dubbed a "Communist sympathizer." The CIA denied this, saying that it was simply trying to support democratic institutions in Italy.

In recent years, the CIA has been more careful about its support for political parties. The CIA has been more focused on supporting political parties that are more moderate and more likely to support democratic institutions. The CIA has also been more transparent about its support for political parties, and it has provided more information about its activities to the Italian government.

The CIA's support for political parties is a complex issue. The CIA has a mandate to support democratic institutions, and it believes that supporting political parties is an important part of this mandate. The CIA also believes that supporting political parties is important for maintaining the stability of democratic institutions in Italy. However, the CIA's support for political parties is not without controversy, and it has been met with widespread condemnation in Italy.
MSU treated to a most memorable 'Tosca'

By ED GLOVER (MSU News Bureau)

Another dazzling operatic performance by the grand Dame of stage and screen, opera star Geraldine Farrar, brought exciting attention to the University of Michigan's observance of the centennial of its Dramatic Arts Department.

The most memorable event of the evening was an unannounced visit by the stage version of the 1938 opera that was an overwhelming success in New York, and remains one of the most popular in the world today, Tosca.

Farrar arrived on her own private plane, after a recording session earlier that day, and was met at the airport by several University officials.

She was accompanied by her husband, Walter Jenkins, and his son, William, who played the role of Scarpia in the opera.

The performance was held in the University's Auditorium, which was packed to capacity with an enthusiastic audience.

The opera is based on the true story of a Roman noblewoman, Ciccio, who was seduced by Scarpia, the chief of police, and then betrayed by him.

Farrar played the role of Ciccio, and her performance was hailed as a triumph.

She sang with great power and beauty, and her ability to convey the emotions of her character was truly remarkable.

The audience was amazed by her singing, and the performance was met with thunderous applause.

After the performance, Farrar and her husband were presented with a bouquet of flowers by the University's President, and the opera was declared a resounding success.

U.S.-Spain base talks begin

MADRID — An American negotiating team arrived in Madrid today for talks with Spanish officials to continue U.S. military bases in Spain. The talks are expected to focus on the future of the 49,000 American military personnel stationed in Spain.

Spain's foreign minister, Juan Carlos Garcia-Arenal, said the talks would cover several issues, including the possibility of a new, more flexible agreement. He added that Spain would not accept a continuation of the current agreement, which expires in 1988.

The American negotiating team is expected to make a final offer on Friday, when Spain's minister of defense is due to return from an official visit to the United States.

Spanish officials have indicated that they are prepared to negotiate a new agreement, but remain concerned about the future of the bases.
