

Science at the Front in War on Crime

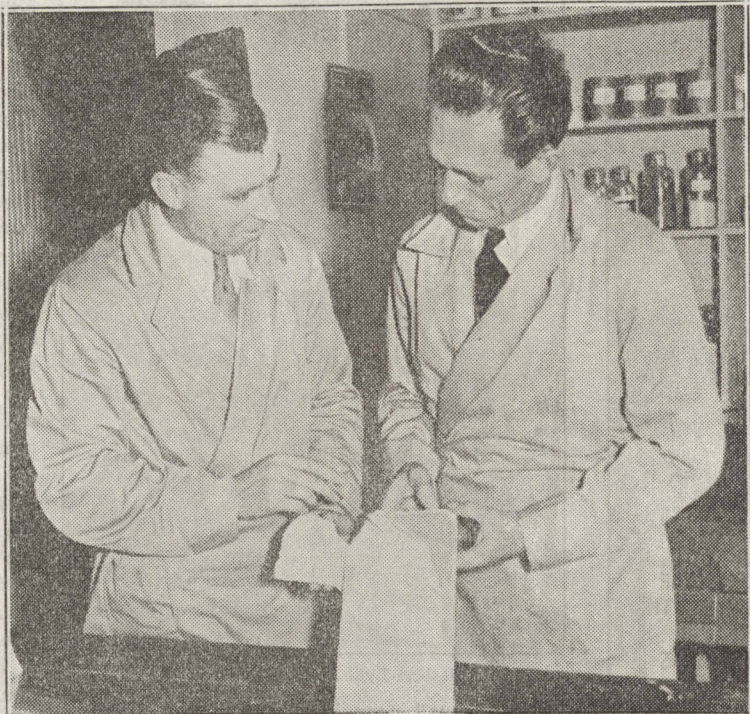

IN ALMOST every phase of human pursuits today science plays a part. One of the newest fields of scientific research is that of crime detection. Police forces in the larger cities are depending more and more upon scientific evidence in tracking down criminals. The part science has played in solving such notable crimes as the Lindbergh kidnaping case is current news. It is now the practice of police officials in the larger cities to submit every shred of evidence connected with a specific crime to a research laboratory. Here the exhibits, such as footprints, marks made on woodwork by burglars, etc., are subjected to microscopic examination. In many cases these laboratory tests bring to light valuable information which could have been obtained in no other way. In New York the metropolitan police force now is equipped with its own research laboratory, where the accompanying photographs were made. The examinations of evidence made in this laboratory are conducted with the aid of microscopes, chemical tests, and other purely scientific apparatus. If a robbery is under investigation, the laboratory examines every inch of the scene of the crime, giving it microscopic attention.

An English Seaside 'Desert'

SAUNTON BEACH, a quiet English seaside resort, furnished the sand for this "Arabian desert" scene. The occasion was the filming of a British motion picture, "McGlusky the Sea Rover." One of the principal members of the cast was Jack Doyle.

Irish heavyweight prize fighter. This picture shows "Arab" tribesmen on the desert sands. If the camera had been pointed the other way the picture would have included English cottages. In recent years British motion pictures have forged ahead.
