but she knew what must be done.

"And she knew what must be done," said Mrs. Seton, as she took the little girl gently in her arms. "But Lady Venture knew her son. Knew his weakness.

"But Lady Venture, when her son arrived and told her of the things that had happened to her, she was not strengthened. She was more agitated than ever. She was not strengthened by the news of the child's return. She was more agitated than ever."

Graciosa, who had not been on the sea before, and who was now about to go out on to the open ocean, was not the least afraid. She was not the least afraid. She was not the least afraid. She was not the least afraid. She was not the least afraid.

"But she knew what must be done," said Mrs. Seton. "And she knew what must be done.

"But Lady Venture knew her son. Knew his weakness."
