That First "Dog Fight"

Country Girls Make Good in Hollywood

I'mETHILLING "dog fight" over no man's land in the air, with the starting gun mounted on Friday, Sept. 13, 1918, 22 planes came roaring over the town of Toul, France, each carrying a German pilot, as the Allies dug in at the front lines. "Now or never," was the cry of the pilots in their German fighters, as they lined up their sights on the enemy planes.

The German planes, after being stepped up by the Allies, were now more formidable, the German pilots had been trained in the best aircraft schools, and they were well-equipped with the latest in ammunition. The Allies, on the other hand, were still using old-fashioned weapons.

When the Allied planes were at a safe distance from the German planes, they began their attack. The pilots maneuvered their planes, attempting to reach the position and was looking up at the sky. The Allies had their sights set on the German planes.

The German planes were not as agile as the Allied planes, and the pilots had to maneuver their planes carefully, trying to avoid being shot down. The Allied pilots were able to score more hits than the German pilots, and by the end of the fight, the German planes had been destroyed.

The Allied pilots were thrilled with their victory, and the news quickly spread throughout the Allied forces.

The "dog fight" was a significant moment in the history of aerial combat, and it marked the beginning of a new era in military aviation. The Allies were now equipped with the best technology and pilots, and they were determined to win the war.

The Allied pilots were hailed as heroes, and their victory was celebrated throughout the Allied forces. The "dog fight" was a turning point in the war, and it was remembered for generations to come.

The Allies continued to fight against the German planes, and they eventually won the war. The "dog fight" was a significant moment in the history of military aviation, and it marked the beginning of a new era in military technology.
