"Charge him with being pro-slavery all over.

Thoot into his hull between wind and water."

wrote Joseph Medill to Abraham Lincoln. The year was 1858; the fiery advice was provided for the Lincoln-Douglas debates by a "Proprietor" of the youthful Chicago Press and Tribune.

About the same time, two young Scotchmen left their jobs with Robertson, Ledlie, Ferguson and Co., Ltd., in Belfast, Ireland. "Display merchandise in windows?" their employer shouted. "Price tickets attached to goods? Fantastic! You can take your wild ideas elsewhere." So the two farseeing young men with nothing but their youth and their inspirations, sailed off to America. Within six months they had established a small dry goods store in Illinois, to which they applied their progressive ideas. The names of the two young men were John Pirie and Samuel Carson; their revolutionary principles were those which have since made department store history & & That was a turbulent era in the history of America. It was an era which encouraged men of ideas and integrity; enterprising men whose strength of principle and determination to follow through, laid the foundations for some of today's most respected institutions. It was the era which fathered Joseph Medill, and John Pirie and Samuel Carson...the founder of a great newspaper, and the founders of a great department store.

WE GREW UP TOGETHER

Chicago Tribune . . 1847=1947

Carson Pirie Scott and Co . . 1854-1947