TRIBUNE VETERANS: A STORY OF DISTINGUISHED SERVICE

Leo Lowensohn

Henry Mau

Edgar L. Maran

Tribune veterans are thrilled by the despatch of their old comrades in arms. Among the veterans who helped to found the Tribune in 1847, there were Leo Lowensohn, the former mayor of Chicago; Henry Mau, who was known as "the old man of the Tribune"; and Edgar L. Maran, who served as a staff writer for many years.

The Tribune was founded in 1847, and Lowensohn served as its first editor. Mau joined the newspaper in 1850, and Maran became a regular contributor in 1852. The three men were close friends and colleagues, and they remained so throughout their careers.

Lowensohn, who was a passionate advocate of free speech and a strong supporter of the Union during the Civil War, was elected mayor of Chicago in 1861. Mau, who was known for his knowledge of international affairs, was a correspondent for the Tribune during the 1860s and 1870s. Maran, who was a prolific writer and editor, served as the Tribune's managing editor for many years.

All three men left a lasting mark on the Tribune and the city of Chicago. They were beloved by their colleagues and revered by generations of Tribune readers.
