Ireland Finds It Pays to Be Free

By JOHN S. STEELE

Ireland is at last free from British domination. This is a momentous event for the Irish people, who have long fought for their independence. The Treaty of 1921 ended the War of Independence, but it was not until 1922 that the Act of Parliament was finally signed, officially declaring Ireland independent.

The Act of Parliament was signed in Dublin on December 6, 1922, and it officially declared Ireland independent of British rule. The Irish Free State was established, and the Irish Republic was formed. The Irish Free State was later renamed the Irish Free State, and it eventually became the Republic of Ireland.

The Irish Free State was a constitutional monarchy, with a king as the head of state. The Irish Free State had a parliametary system, with a bicameral legislature. The Irish Free State was also a member of the British Commonwealth of Nations, and it was a part of the British Empire.

The Irish Free State was a unique and powerful state, and it played a significant role in the history of the world.
