The White House was a beehive of activity on Saturday. What 100,000 Americans in the Philippines and more than 200,000 in the British Empire had been waiting for came to pass. The President, the Executive Committee of the American Red Cross, Secretary of War Stimson, Secretary of the Navy and many other high officials were assembled in the East Room. Fenders of our nation's battleship Missouri were being lowered into the water at 4 p.m. The President's former Secretary of State, Dr. Cordell Hull, was in the White House to present the acknowledgment of the surrender message, which had been completed and returned to the state of receipt in Washington, D.C., A half hour later, the President had issued the announcement of Army demobilization. The executive branch of the Federal government was behaving like the rear guard of an army. The order failed to dampen the noise of the rumbling reveille. The entire area, in fact, lived up to the proclamation, "We are not only living, we are strong."

City Is Wild Seconds After Peace News

By William McKeen

Washington, D.C. -- In two hours, peace was in the air at the State Department. Unable to extricate himself from the swarms of people, Secretary of State Cordell Hull had to ask his aide to carry his bag to the train.

A happy smile lit up his face, and only by looking closely could one find the slight wrinkle which indicated to the world that he was not yet 65 years old.

In the corridors of power, every man had hoped for peace for a year. Now the war was finally over.
