HERE'S A WORD PICTURE OF GERMANY UNDER THE BROWN WAVE OF HITLERISM

By Jay Allen

FROM Paris to the Mediterranean coast, from Berlin to the frontiers that mark the west end of the German Empire, there is a swiftly moving line of black and white soldiers and police that stretches for a thousand miles. By day and by night, these lines march from town to town, from campus to campus, from office to office, from home to home, in an unceasing movement that is felt everywhere. Inevitably, this movement is felt as a menacing presence.

The movement is part of a larger trend, a world movement that has taken root in Europe and spread to other parts of the world. It is a movement of hatred, of fear, of hatred, of fear, of hatred, of fear. It is a movement that cannot be stopped, that cannot be reversed, that cannot be defeated.

During the war, people never imagined that they would be fighting in a war. But now, the war is over, and the people of Europe have to face the reality of the new world. They have to face the fact that they are not alone, that they are not invincible, that they are not eternal.

The people of Europe are divided. Some are still fighting, some are trying to find their way, some are trying to escape. But all are facing the same reality, the same challenge, the same struggle.

The people of Europe are not alone. They have friends, they have allies, they have support. But they also have enemies, they have opponents, they have foes. Their struggle is not easy, but it is not hopeless. They have a choice, they have a future. And they have a responsibility to make the right choice, to build the right future, to create the right world.
