DICTATOR HITLER ORDERS EVEN WOMEN AND BABIES OF GERMANY IN NAZI UNIFORM

In a move that has enraged the Allies, but which is hotly defended in Germany. Ten young women are shown here. The second from the left, named Inge, was one of the first to arrive at the camp.

By Jay Allen

Kolberg, Germany.

GROSSHEIM is hotly defended in Germany. Ten young women are shown here. The second from the left, named Inge, was one of the first to arrive at the camp.

In 1933, when the Nazis came to power, a young woman named Inge joined the SS. She has been in the camp ever since, working as a nurse. The women are dressed in统一 and carry guns, just like the men.

The move has caused outrage among the Allies, who have consistently opposed the treatment of women and children by the Nazis. The Allies have threatened to take action, but so far have not been able to do so.

The move has also been condemned by human rights groups, who have called it a violation of basic human rights.

Despite the international backlash, the Nazis have continued to defend their actions, arguing that women and children are just as important in the war effort as men.

The move has sparked a debate about the role of women in modern warfare, with some arguing that women should be allowed to fight, while others argue that it is not fair to force them to do so.

The Allies have vowed to continue their efforts to end the treatment of women and children in Germany, but it remains to be seen whether they will be successful.