Pigeon’s building boom!

Several projects are under construction or nearing completion throughout the Pigeon area, as the 1993 growth spurt which started with new structures for Bay Port State Bank, McWernick Motors, Inc. and Michigan Drycleaning Co. continues.

ABOVE: Finished touches are being added to the former McWernick Motors building at 8 S. Main, Pigeon, which is now occupied by Diener’s Home of Fine Furnishings. The furniture, carpet and household accessory store supplements the appliance and electrical contracting business owned by Dennis and Carol Diener. Here, the new wood exterior and overhang are being added.

Their new store opened to good crowds last Thursday morning. The former Diener Electric building is being renovated for Kent McKee’s Jewelry, which should open in the next 30 days.

BELOW, work continues on the $100,000 expansion program at the Pigeon District Library. Brick work is being completed on the east wall, in this view looking west along Nizt Street. New reference rooms, conference rooms, an audio-visual room and more work and storage space are being added.

Food pantry program now seeking donations

By RICH SWARTZENDBERGER

Although in this election year many incumbent candidates boast of a growing economy, there are families that haven’t shared in that apparent prosperity.

The Bay Port and Owendale congregations of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints (RLDS) are involved in erasing some of the hunger in needy families with a food pantry program.

These local churches have provided food for families in financial distress for the past seven years. In the last year, however, the assistance program has grown rapidly after becoming involved with the Human Development Commission.

After responding to an invitation from HDC to area pastors, Elder Ervin Haley agreed to help distribute food to individuals referred by the organization. In return, HDC provides financial assistance to the RLDS food pantry to keep the shelves stocked.

Individuals in the Pigeon, Elton, Bay Port, Caseville, Owendale and Sebewaing areas have been assisted through the programs, says RLDS Stewardship Chairman Roy Lawrence.

In the first five months of this year 56 food deliveries to needy families were made, Lawrence says. He points out, however, that calls for assistance tapers off in the summer and picks up again during the onset of cold weather.

The food closet is not intended to be the only food source for needy families, but rather a supplemental type of program, notes Lawrence.

With involvement of some financial grants from HDC, some paperwork is required with the initial food delivery. An application which requires information about family size and income, as well as the source and amount of family income helps channel the food assistance to those truly in need.

Lawrence emphasizes that the RLDS program supplies only food and doesn’t provide any cash assistance for rent, utilities or other expenses.

To donate food to the program or to refer a family who needs assistance with food supplies, contact Roy Lawrence, Ervin Haley or the Human Development Commission in Bad Axe or Caro.
As we see it editorially

It's a nice story, but...

W e are all the reader of the story of Jack Frost comes around each year to make the leaves bright, the colors beautiful full colors. It's a nice story, but we're sorry to see it end.

In reality, the coloring of leaves is a complex phenomenon involving the interaction of several factors such as temperature, sunlight, and chlorophyll degradation. The process of leaf coloration involves the breakdown of chlorophyll, which is responsible for the green color in leaves. As the days get shorter and the temperature drops, the production of chlorophyll decreases, and other pigments such as carotenoids and anthocyanins become more visible, giving leaves their autumn colors.

The weather conditions also affect the way colors are exhibited by leaves. Cool nights (4 degrees and cooler) and warm days promote color change. During the cool nights, sugars are transported from the leaves to the roots, where they are broken down into energy for the tree. During the day, sugars are transported back to the leaves, where they are used for photosynthesis. The ratio of sugars to water in the leaves determines the color of the leaves. If the ratio is high, the leaves turn red or orange; if low, the leaves turn yellow or green.

The nature of jack frost is intriguing, but it is not the last word on the topic. There are many other factors that contribute to the beauty of autumn colors, and it is fascinating to explore them further.

What is visible are the pigments in the leaves. They were there all along with the chlorophyll, but were hidden by the stronger green color. Always present, always ready to show their true colors when the time is right.

Laker supporter concerned about declining high school curriculum

Dear Editor,

I am a long-time supporter of Laker High School, and I am concerned about the declining quality of the high school curriculum. I believe that the school is doing a disservice to the students by offering a curriculum that is not challenging enough. I would like to see the school do more to ensure that students are prepared for college and for life.

Flight of the Timberdoodle

As I near the end of the woods, my heart begins to quicken. A long, low creature circles above, with a noisy, shuttering flight. The beauty of the forest is a sight to behold, but not one that I can easily forget. I watch as the buoyant bird ascends into the sky, its wings beating a steady rhythm. The timberdoodle, or American Woodcock, is a small and secretive bird that is found in the forests of North America. It is known for its unique courtship flight, which is a display of acrobatics and aerial maneuvers.

Prior to the flight, the male timberdoodle will select a suitable territory and then prepare for the aerial display. It will fly in a zigzag pattern, ascending and descending, before executing a roll and spinning in the air. The purpose of this display is to attract a mate and establish a territory.

The timberdoodle’s flight is a remarkable sight to behold. It is a display of natural beauty and a testament to the wonders of the natural world. As I watch the bird soar, I am struck by the beauty of the forest and the importance of preserving it for future generations.

Let it make a beautiful difference in you!

What to do with high moisture corn? Feed it!

Delays planting this spring, high moisture corn in the field could hurt farmers with high moisture crops. The ideal moisture content for most cereal grains, such as soybeans, is approximately 11 to 13% moisture. However, if the moisture content exceeds 13%, the seed quality is compromised.

Several options exist for treating high moisture corn. One option is to dry the corn, either naturally or artificially. Artificially drying the corn can be achieved using equipment such as grain dryers, which can be combined with drying beds.

A second option is to use the high moisture corn as feed. High moisture corn can be used directly as feed for livestock, such as cattle, or it can be processed into other feed ingredients, such as distillers grains or corn gluten feed.

A third option is to store the high moisture corn in airtight containers to prevent moisture from further increasing. Care must be taken to ensure that the containers are well-sealed to prevent moisture from entering.

In summary, when dealing with high moisture corn, it is important to consider the potential negative impacts on seed quality and take appropriate actions to mitigate these effects. Whether drying, using as feed, or storing, careful management is crucial to ensure the integrity of the crop.
