As we see it

He was wrong about who really is in charge

It takes an open-minded person to admit when he or she is wrong. Likewise, it takes a REALY reasonable person to admit to someone else when they are wrong — even if they're errors — because the printed or spoken word is hard to remove.

National columnist Robert Novak recently retracted a political error he had made. In a speech to the National Down Syndrome Society, in a speech to the National Down Syndrome Society, he admitted he was wrong about his prediction that Bush would win the presidential election.

I have no issue with Novak's admission. In fact, I think it's commendable. But I wonder if the same thing is true of most people, of most voters, of most politicians, of most journalists.

Thank you for reading The Progress-Advocate.

Despite the large field and the distance from the woods, the band was a far-off, almost unnoticeable presence in the distance. The distance made it seem smaller, its volume and intensity reduced by the empty space. The band members appeared tiny, their movements slow and deliberate. It was easy to mistake the band for an distant, almost forgotten memory.

The Importance of the Journey

The importance of the journey is often overlooked. It is easy to focus on the destination or the end result, but the journey itself is just as important. The journey is where we learn, grow, and discover. It is where we make mistakes and learn from them. The journey is where we create memories and meaningful experiences.

Outdoor Report...

The journey is often the most important part of the experience. It is where we connect with nature, where we learn to appreciate the beauty of the world around us. It is where we find our strength and resilience. The journey is where we become who we are.

DEAR MR. ROSS: I am writing to you about my recent experiences with the church of which I am an elder. When I first wrote, my hope was that you would agree that the church’s position on LGBTQ+ people was hurtful and unproductive. I was encouraged to hear you say you would be looking into this matter, but I am afraid that your letter reflects no change in the church’s policy. I think it is important that the church’s values reflect the love and acceptance that Jesus taught. I hope you will consider revising your church’s policy on LGBTQ+ members.
