All effort is the result of motive; the motive gives character to the deed and to the deed, the deed exerts a reflex influence upon the actor. There is, perhaps, no motive which has a more radical effect upon the character of the actor than the expectation of a just recompense for every legitimate effort.

indeed it is clearly demonstrated by all classes, from the lowest to the highest ranks of society, that the expectation of reward is our most powerful force to sustain action in our private lives, as well as in our public life.

It is not, however, the mere hope of reward which gives character to the deed and to the deed, the deed exerts a reflex influence upon the actor.
