upon his subjects. "What business is it of thine?" the Czar, with anger. "Know that I reverence God and His Holy Mother more earnestly, perhaps, than thou dost. It is a duty of my sovereign office, and a duty that I owe to God, to save my people from harm, and to protect with public vengeance crimes that tend to the common ruin."

The work of decapitation went on, therefore. The infuriate Emperor compelled the nobles of his court to act as executioners. On one occasion, as Mr. Schuyler records, as many as 109 men, accused of mutiny and treason, were decapitated by the nobles, in the presence of the Czar, who even, it is said, used the ax sometimes with his own hands. It was not uncommon for him to strike his courtiers with his fist. Upon the whole, he behaved like a patriot and philanthropist who was subject to fits of
