LOYAL AT LAST.

A Tale of Love and Adventure in the Late Civil War.

By Mary A. Dowling.

Chapter II.

In the midst of the confusion and excitement that reigned throughout the city, little attention was paid to the arrival of a young woman who had just stepped off the train at the station. She was accompanied by a man who was carrying a heavy case, and as they made their way to the hotel, the whispers and glances of the people around them suggested that they were a couple of strangers in town.

The young woman was dressed in a simple black gown, with a bonnet that shaded her face from the sunlight. She appeared to be about twenty years old, and her举止 was dignified and reserved.

As they entered the hotel, the young woman approached the desk to make her inquiries. She was greeted by the hotel manager, who was a middle-aged man with a kindly face.

"Madam," he said, "what can I do for you?"

She explained her situation to him, and he directed her to a room on the second floor. As she made her way to her room, she noticed a poster on the wall that read, "Wanted - War Correspondents."

She smiled to herself, thinking that her father had always been interested in the war, and she wondered if he would ever join the ranks of the war correspondents.

Later that evening, as she sat on her bed, she heard the sound of footsteps outside her door. She glanced at her watch and saw that it was almost midnight. She decided to go outside and see if she could find out what was happening.

As she stepped out onto the street, she saw a group of men gathered around a fire. They were all dressed in uniforms, and they appeared to be soldiers.

She approached them, trying to make herself heard over the noise of the fire. "Excuse me," she said, "I'm new here, and I was wondering if you could tell me what's going on?"

One of the soldiers looked up at her and smiled. "We're just taking a break," he said. "We've been fighting for days, and we're all starved and tired."

"But what about the war?" she asked. "How can you just take a break like this?"

The soldier shrugged his shoulders. "It's the way things go," he said. "We'll be back in action tomorrow morning, and we'll be ready to fight."
