Countess Narona.

By Wilkie Collins.

THE FIRST PART.

'Twas dark! how may she have met her fate?

The Countess of Narona was a woman of great beauty and charm. She was the Countess of a grand old family, and had long been the talk of the town. She was always elegantly dressed, and was the center of attention wherever she went. Her husband, the Count, was a wealthy man, and the couple lived in grand style.

One evening, the Countess went out for a walk. It was a dark night, and she was accompanied by her maid. As they walked along the street, they heard a noise behind them. They turned to look, and saw a man standing in the street.

"What do you want?" asked the Countess.

The man was dressed in dark clothes, and his face was covered by a hood. He said nothing, but pointed to his mouth. The Countess understood, and gave him a small bag of coins.

The man took the bag and disappeared into the darkness. The Countess and her maid continued their walk, but they were nervous and afraid. They continued to look back over their shoulders, but the man was nowhere in sight.

As they reached their home, they saw a horse and carriage waiting outside. The driver opened the door and invited them inside. The Countess and her maid got into the carriage and were driven home.

The next day, the Countess was laid to rest in the family mausoleum. The funeral was a grand affair, and the town mourned her loss. The Count was desolate, and his grief was only increased by the mystery of the night when his wife had met her end.

Let us manage to keep good friends with whom we differ, even when they are wrong, for very many very useful purposes will be included by that.

There is one terrible way to win little personal battles at the expense of the general welfare.

There is at least one great American who greatly admires the American style of democracy, who finds no objection to its democratic institutions, who has no objection to its democratic processes, who has no objection to its democratic policies, who has no objection to its democratic principles, who has no objection to its democratic institutions, who has no objection to its democratic policies, who has no objection to its democratic principles, who has no objection to its democratic institutions, who has no objection to its democratic policies, who has no objection to its democratic principles.

Notwithstanding the fact that the administration of a government is a matter of great importance, there is no doubt that it is very difficult to know what to do about it. There are so many things to be considered.

In the present situation, there is no doubt that the administration of a government is a matter of great importance, there is no doubt that it is very difficult to know what to do about it. There are so many things to be considered.

Our national councils are no longer visited by the old masters, the old masters and the old masters and the old masters.
