IT CURED HIM. He had a favorite phrase, each day into our ears he'd din it: "What's been talked about he'd say—" "He wasn't in it."

A HEATHEN'S REVENGE.

FROM the rough little red wood cabin under the hot hillside, sounded a curious wild wailing. Now harsh and shrill as a triumph, now low and sorrowful as if brooding over defeat, it rose and fell like a savage incantation disturbing the peaceful sunset.

It had been a hot, toilsome day for Ah Lee. Since early morning he had patiently plodded hour after hour, behind the old bay mare with the cultivator in the great vineyard on the slope of the dusty hill.

He had eaten his frugal supper of rice and dried fish, drank his tea, and with rice bowl and chopsticks still on the floor beside him he was taking his ease, the week's hard work well ended.

He was in no mood for angling today, but sat sullenly thinking. Rolling a cigarette and lighting it, he puffed stately while staring down at the pool in which was mirrored his snub nose, shining eyes and ugly, coffee-colored face.

AN AWFUL CYCLONE.

Terrible Loss of Life and Property Near St. Paul.

A few minutes before five o'clock Sunday afternoon a threatening storm began to collect in the region of Lake Michigan.

The place where the cyclone struck the ground and caused loss of life was on the shore of Lake Gervais, where J. H. Schurmer and Charles Schurmer of St. Paul, Minn., were taking a summer cottage in a little basin, where Simon Good was also located.
