

ments by the term "self-made" men, there are thousands of examples of natural ability and special talents gone to waste because of the indifference of parents and guardians to the earliest traces of tastes and inclinations by children.

ANT system is radically wrong that makes it possible to delay the enforcement of a state judgment in cases of foreign debtors who have been affirmed by the highest state tribunal, unless a case of probable error involving some question of federal jurisdiction is clearly made out.

We are not prone to lament over the fact that the United States has fought for foreign wars in vain, and has no wealth of trophies torn from other lands by her armies. But such memorials as we possess of American prowess in the field have a historical interest that is none the less for their scanty numbers.

A contemporary remarks that "Germany has not succeeded in finding another Bismarck. It is better provided with Von Moltke's" Germany, however, has continued to exist since Bismarck's exit from public life, and will probably survive the loss of the famous minister. Few men, however, great or really indispensable to their country.

If a man is not self-educated in the sense of learning for himself the uses of life, the judgment of human nature and the complex mastery of the details of his special line of effort, he will never amount to much, whether he goes through college or not. It is not good things provided the material they work amounts to anything. The best college on earth cannot turn habits and common sense.

Their bad habits which keep people poor are pretty generally known. It would be much better if the people of this world could study the opposite. Benjamin Franklin and a few other philo-sophic minds have recognized this truth; but Franklin is least known that great wealth was often made by advancing his well-known prescription of industry and economy as the sure means of attaining competence.

An American army officer, lecturing on the modern changes in war methods, rather belittling the military art, said that he had seen a map of the continental nation of Europe, has entirely discarded mounted infantry. Lord Wolsey, on the other hand, considers that the more important military lessons to be drawn from the American civil war are those of the cavalry service, and he predicts that mounted infantry will find favor again in the future. But it is of no consequence to an army.
