A LONDON CASE.

THIS was one of numerous instances of marriage pledges. The plaintiff was a very young man, and the defendant was a woman of bad character.

The previous story was simple. The defendant, having wanted money, went to the plaintiff and asked for it. The plaintiff, after some hesitation, gave her the money, and then returned to her. The defendant then went to the plaintiff's house and stated that she had invested the money in a mine, and that she was now ready to repay her. However, when the plaintiff returned to her, she found that the defendant had not invested the money as she had said, but had merely spent it on herself.

The defendant was arrested and charged with forgery. The case was tried, and the defendant was found guilty. She was sentenced to two years in a reformatory institution.

The plaintiff then went to the reformatory institution and visited the defendant. The defendant was very sad and said that she was very sorry for what she had done. The plaintiff then said that he would forgive her, and that he would spend the money that the defendant had given him. The defendant was very happy and said that she would try to be good.

A few weeks later, the defendant was released from the reformatory institution. She then went to the plaintiff's house and thanked him for the money that he had given her. She then asked the plaintiff if he would marry her. The plaintiff said that he would, and they were married.

The case was later reported in a newspaper. The newspaper said that the defendant was very happy and that she was now trying to be good. The newspaper also said that the plaintiff was very happy and that he was now trying to be good.
