MICHIGAN MATTERS.

ABANDONING A MINE.

A burger with an ingenious name is apparently being served in a mining town. In the town of Iron Mountain, Michigan, there is a burger called the "Abandoning a Mine." The burger is named after the abandoned mines in the area, and it is said to be a popular dish among locals and visitors alike. The burger is made with a special sauce that is believed to mimic the flavors of the coal dust from the abandoned mines. However, the restaurant管理人员 refused to reveal the actual ingredients of the sauce to prevent competitors from copying it.

ABANDONED MINES.

The Abandoned Mines of Iron Mountain are a popular tourist attraction. The town is known for its rich mining history, and many of the old mine shafts have been turned into hiking trails for visitors. The Abandoned Mines Trail is a 2.5-mile hike that takes visitors through the old mine shafts and provides a glimpse into the town's past. The trail is open to hikers of all ages and abilities, and it is a great way to experience the history of the town.

THURSDAY, APRIL 21, 1897

In the evening last week a man who had been in the heraldic parlors, while in the room for purposes of entering the watchman, was struck down by an explosion of the electric lights. He stood by the side of a horse, when the explosion occurred. He was carried into the building, and after some time was pronounced dead.

The man's name was Jones, and he was a prominent citizen of the place. He was known to everyone, and his death is a loss to the community. His funeral is to be held this afternoon, and the body will be sent to his home in the country for burial.
