THE LOST IDEAL

MIRANDA was a charming little girl of 17; she was also a bundle of contradictions—cultured and crude, clever and foolish, sentimental and very much alive to the ridiculous. She was also extremely pretty in the Irish way.

which is, perhaps, the prettiest way in the world. Her father, the rector, was Irish, and he and all his family were genial, cheery folk, who laughed and grew fat. Miranda was rather ashamed of her own keen sense of fun, which belonged, she supposed, to her "lower nature."

Indeed, an ideal Ferdinand (she always thought of him as "Ferdinand") already haunted her maiden meditations—an adorable being, undreamed of in mature philosophy; a splendid guest to whom the doors of her heart were to fly open.

One September day, the beaming rector, whose beams had never been obscured except when his only child's mother died ten years before, called to Miranda from his study window.

"Chick, would you like to come to London with me for a week?"

"Yes, papa," she said, in a little, languid voice, and with a dreamy gaze beyond him into infinity. She had very nearly jumped for joy, but recollected the dignity of womanhood in time, and waited until she got into her own room. Then she did.

"They went to the house of her father's sister in London. She was a rich and lively old maid, then daily curing a backache at some German baths, and spending most of her time with much cheerfulness up to her chin in them."

The happy old person, who did not often give himself a holiday, enjoyed it thoroughly and so did Miranda.

One morning the rector had left Miranda all alone. She meant to recline in an easy chair and read Browning; but she got rather strained over "Sordello," which many who can run cannot read.

Now Miranda, reclining on her easy chair, found it so much easier than Browning that she fell asleep.

She was shocked at herself when she awoke and found the poet prone at her feet. However, she got up, stretched her arms and thought she would explore the three drawing-rooms in search of new toys and curiosities, of which her aunt was a great collector.

She came to the smallest room at the end, and even as she crossed the threshold her eyes fell on a face! She stopped short, then went forward with elated hands and stood to gaze. It was only the photograph of a very handsome young man, stuck into the last leaf of a photograph screen standing on a little table, but in that moment Miranda thought she forestalled the rupture of a realized ideal.

In those dark eyes she seemed to read genius and sweetness; in that counterfeited presentation she seemed to recognize the Ferdinand of her dreams.

Almost shyly she slipped the faded carte out of the littlescreen without even a glance at its companions there. The image had no superscription; the upper and lower edges of the mount had been pared away to admit of its insertion in the screen. This only added the fitting touch of mystery.

Miranda could not bring herself to replace and resign what seemed

HELL ON EARTH.

The New Penitentiary which will be built in Siberia.

A St. Petersburg letter says it has been decreed by the czar's government that Siberia is too good for convicts, and as soon as the trans-Siberian railway has penetrated its gloomy depths it will be turned into a "paradise" for agricultural settlers and mining sharps, while nihilists and other refractory members of Russian society will in the future be accommodated on the island of Saghalin, off the coast of Russian Manchuria, the eastern terminus of the czar's possessions, north of Japan.

So revolting and horrible to civilized nations is Saghalin that the czar consented to its adoption as an open air prison only after the assassination of Carnot and the discovery of the recent plots against his own life. The people and the convicts of Siberia never speak of the island other than "the hell of Saghalin," and its climate is said to be so much worse than that of Siberia as to rob this appellation of an exaggerated character, even in the mouths of these lost ones.

The island is separated from the main land by the gulf of Tartary and its eastern coast is washed by the sea of Okhotsk. The governor of Manchuria has reported that a human being not born on the island cannot live more than a year there. There is no means of escape except in the winter, when, if a prisoner can manage to make his way 100 miles north from the prison, it is possible to reach the mainland over the ice. The ice bridge is guarded; still, two or three prisoners have escaped by dodging behind masses of snow and ice, or, what is far more probable, by bribing officials. At the present moment, the most interesting convict of Saghalin is Sophie Blunstein, a full-blooded Russian, in spite of her German name. She first achieved criminal renown by pressing her attentions upon the shah of Persia during the latter's visit to St. Petersburg. Sophie had avowedly no intention of adding his majesty to her list of admirers, but sought his acquaintance merely for the purpose of relieving him, if possible, of some of his diamonds. She was foiled in her efforts, but succeeded in having her private car attached to the shah's special train. For this piece of enterprise she was banished to Siberia for a year, and while there organized a band of cutthroats and robbers whose services she controlled on the continent after their terms had expired. She is said to be the sharpest criminal living, and in sending her to Saghalin the Russian government claims to have conferred a lasting benefit upon the wealthy class.

almost sacredly her own, almost heaven-sent. She put the heavenly Ferdinand into her pocket, and when the rector and his daughter went home to the rectory, Ferdinand went, too.

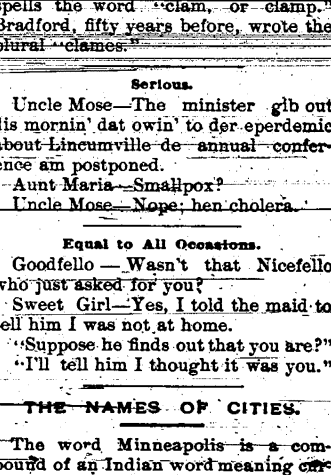

Thereafter Miranda spent much time in contemplation of that sun-pictured face. In point of fact it was a badly executed photograph, for there was haziness in some of the outlines, a want of finish in some of the details. This, however, enhanced its significance in Miranda's eyes, and appeared to her to imply a peculiar value in the portrait as a work of art.

The word Minneapolis is a compound of an Indian word meaning curling water and a Greek word meaning city.

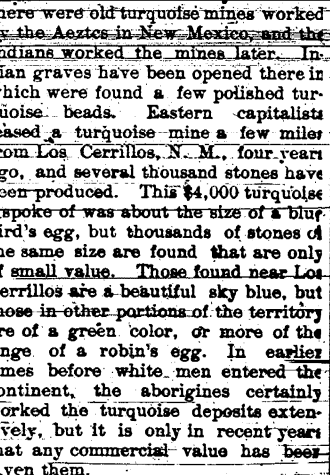

Pittsburg was originally called Fort Duquesne; then became Fort Pitt, in honor of the great British premier.

KNOWLEDGE

Brings comfort and improvement and tends to personal enjoyment when rightly used. The many who live better than others and enjoy life more, with less expenditure, by more promptly adopting the world's best products to the needs of physical being, will attest the value to health of the pure liquid laxative principles embraced in the remedy Syrup of Figs.

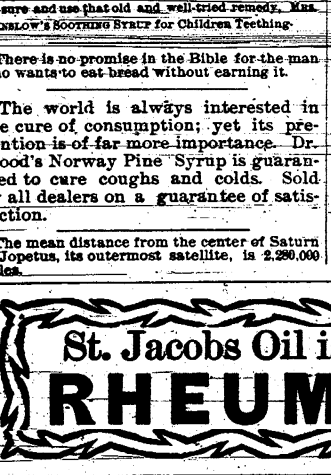

Its excellence is due to its presenting in the form most acceptable and pleasant to the taste, the refreshing and truly beneficial properties of a perfect laxative; effectually cleansing the system, dispelling colds, headaches and fevers and permanently curing constipation. It has given satisfaction to millions and met with the approval of the medical profession, because it acts on the Kidneys, Liver and Bowels without weakening them and it is perfectly free from every objectionable substance.
