Some crudities marred it, but the ensemble was bewitching.

The face—that of a girl in the first bloom of maidenhood-looked back at you over one mistily-draped white shoulder. The liquid eyes were laughter-lit the slightly-parted scarlet lips had a shy droop, there was a little, round dimple in the chin, the hair that melted into the soft gown and dusky background was a wind-blown tangle of reddish gold.

Harwood entered the shop, shutting out the whirling snowflakes behind

"Third floor back," she returned, shortly.

Harwood knocked. A voice bade him enter. He went in. The room was large, bare, dreary. Some sketches were tacked on the walls. An easel and chair stood in the center of the apartment. A handful of fire and a tiny sheet-iron stove made the cold of the lace more noticeable.

Mr. Brand, I believe?" The occupant, an invalid with death written in his hollow eyes, on his bluereined hands, bowed assent.

"I came," said Harwood, declining the solitary chair which was proffered him, "about the picture exhibited in fercer's window. It is not for sale?"

Mile. Conedon, whose manners are very simple, is quick and sprightly. M. Mery, who has become the biographer of the visionary of the Rue Paradis, and who has published a little book about her, of which 26,000 in a recent communication to the State copies have been sold, tells how Mile. Conedon became aware of what she calls her mission. For some years past the Conedon family used to visit a Mrs -, who lives at 86 Faubourg St. Honore. This lady, who is elderly now, is said formerly possessed the gift which Mile. Conedon now has. But the angel withdrew from her because, Mile Conedon says, she had sponged on him.
