LL WHO KNEW Esther Waite loved her. She was very handsome and her sweet manners won her many friends on all sides. Without kith or kin in the wide world many wondered why she had reached the age of 28 unmarried. She held a responsible position and the work connected with it she so loved that she often said that it seemed more play than work.

ESTHER WAITE.

One cold winter night she came into her bright room dissatisfied and unhappy. In her pocket was a letter containg a proposal of marriage. This and its train of thought clouded her brow. Barren, hopeless—her future life looked to her that night. What would the years bring? She could not always work, her beauty now so exquisite in its mature development must in a few years fade. He would be a pleasant companion and even if she did not love him as she knew she could love some one what difference could it make? Drawing her couch near the window where she could look out across the bay she sunk into a reverie. Time flies so quickly, yet men have told us that lifetimes have been lived in a few moments.

On the veranda of a stately home a lady sat talking to a little brown eyed girl. Seemingly all of earth's blessings had descended on her golden head. She had beauty, wealth, love, yet the look of utter desolation on her face was pitiable to see. All her friends nad said that Esther Waite had done well She had everything she wanted. Why wasn't she happy?

A little time before with a party of friends she had visited our northern lakes. One day she had taken a rowboat and growing weary had let it drift into a little inlet. She lay back against the seat. All nature seemed singing the glad song of life and Esther, too, was glad. The heat and fatigue of rowing and the gentle dip of the boat gradually lulled her to sleep. beautiful she looked as she lay there, the sun shining on her golden head and her profile turned toward the Brilliantly she entertained her guest that night. She caught her husband's eyes as they gazed at her in proud satisfaction, as he would look at his horses, she thought, her lips curling scornfully. #### INCALLS' SPOTTED DOG. How His Owner Turned the Laugh

General Grant.

General Horace Porter, in his "Campaigning with Grant," Century, relates the following anecdota:

General Ingalls had just returned through camp, and attracted no end of attention. A dog of any kind was rather an unusual sight in an army in the field, and an animal of the peculiar marks and aristocratic bearing of Ingalls' companion excited widespread remark. Every time the dog ame to headquarters General Grant was certain to comment upon the animal and perpetrate some good-natured joke at the expense of his classmate. The dog followed the usual canine custom and expressed his feelings by an agitation of his caudal appendage. To describe his actions astronomically, it nay be said that he indicated anger by imparting to his tail a series of longiudinal vibrations, and pleasure by giving it a gentle "motion in azimuth"- familiarly known as a wag. one evening, as the general was sit-ting in front of his quarters, Ingalls came up to have a chat with him, and was followed by the dog, which sat ficer and then at the other, as if to som. The Buildwht in Seville.

The name of Spain's most noted matador, Mazzantini, stood out in large, bold letters. In Spain there is an enthusiasm for this sport and an eagerness to read its results that rivals the most excited interest Americans take in home sports. The leading dailies have a special column for the reports of bullfights from all over the country, under the heading "Seccion Taurina," similar to the column of baseball percentage or to the bulletin of prize fights in our own journals. Of course, the American finds fault with the Spaniard for indulging in such sport, and the women of our country chancing to visit Spain-find it "just horrible." To the credit of the Spanish lady it must be said that while she finds many sports of the American women objectionable, she avoids the amphitheater in her own country, whether merely out of respecfor the laws of the church, forbidding participation or attendance at bullfights under severe penalty, or from might deaden feminine sensibility, as that of the vestal virgins of Rome was deadened by gladiatorial contests, I care not to decide. It is safe, however to say that the Christian Catholic woman of Spain does not patronize bullfights.

RURAL FREE DELIVERY.

For more than seven months the experiment of mail delivery by carriers n agricultural sections of forty-four states has been in progress from a certain number of selected postoffices. In at least one respect this experiment has been an unqualified success; the people take a decided interest in it, are benefited by it, and do their utmost to facilitate the work of the carriers. The farmers urge, and in some cases demand, the continuance of the ser vice. The delivery is most easily and effectually performed by the aid of the bi-A wheelman, carrying in a bag cycle. swung from his shoulder from thirty to forty pounds of mail, covers a route of about twenty-six miles in from three to four hours' time. Two carriers are employed on-such a route. Every farmer along the route usually provides for the carriers' convenience a box, which is placed near the road on a post or a tree.

Of course the bicycle can be used only when the roads are good enough to afford wheeling. As a general thing, it is available only after the first of April in the spring, and until snow or mud renders the roads impracticable in the fall. Even within this period there are intervals when the carrier can not ride the wheel. At such times horses and wagons must be rescrted to, and these increase the cost and time taken to deliver the mail.

Indeed an autoprity on the subject declares that good roads and rural free delivery of mail go together, and that daily delivery can be depended on onlv when the road bed is in good condition.

The result of the experiment has alresay been to further the convenience and agglet the material progress of the chosen districts in which it has been tried. If it has also been a conspicu ous practical example of the benefit of good roads, its good effects will be by no means limited to those districts, but will extend to the whole country

Electric Traction.

An important advance in passenger transportation has been made by one of he large railroad lines leading out of New York city. It has become an established fact that long-distance transportation by electric power is not only difficult in many ways, but is altogether too exzpensive to be practical. This new departure takes up local passenger traffic and conveys for a short distance an enormous number of people at a very high rate of speed and a very small cost to the company. The most notable feature is the introduction of a third rail, which takes the place of the ordinary trolley wire. This rail is placed on blocks midway between the main rails. The risk to the public has, it is said, been very largely removed by fencing the roads and forbidding travel thereon. The rail is broken at crossings and the current is cut out while the train is stopping at stations. Taking into account the enormous weight of the locomotive, which in itself requires a tremendous power to move it at a high rate speed, it is easy to see that power applied merely to the cars themselves may be relatively less than that which drives the ordinary train. There is one advantage in the electric line, which is of itself sufficient to commend it to the traveling public. There is a total absence of smoke, cinders and dirt and infinitely less vibration and jarring than by the usual steam cars. While there is not at present any prospect that electricity will be used for longdistance transportation, it is very evident that this is the coming power of Lordly "De Smythes." "When it comes to hooking a Norman prefix in front of Smith or absolutely transmogrifying poor Smith into "De Smythe" one wonders how these degenerate Smiths can sleep in their heds for fear of the wrath of the "old artificers in metals," says a writer in Good Words. This liberty taken with a cognomen is not only in bad taste, but shows absolute ignor ance. "De" must preceue a constant an occupative surname was nev-"De" must precede a territorial You will thus find him entered in many ways, including "le Smyth," e. g., "Fhillip le Smethe," "Henry le Smeyt," "Gilbert le Smyth," "William le Smyt," but never a "De."

How Far Was It?

Southern distances are peculiar, and the road directions which a tourist receives are sometimes wanting in the quality of explicitness. from here to Brushburg?" asked a tourist of an old fellow who was hoeing weeds in a field of sickly corn "down South." "Is it far?" hain't so very fer nor it haint so very nigh. If you go around by the big road it's ferder nor it is nigh, but if you cut acrost country it's nigher nor it is fer, an' if you keep right straight ahead it's kinder betwixt nigh an' fer, but it's considerable of a ja'nt from hyar no matter how you git thar. -Herper's Bazar.

Important Point-

One of the wittiest of the numberless witty retorts of Sheridan was that made to Pitt on one occasion. Pitt had compared the constant opposition of Sheridan to an everlasting drag-chain, clogging all the wheels, retarding the career and embarrassing the progress of government. To this Sheridan, with his usual promptness, replied that one important fact about the real drag-chain had been omitted in the minister's apt simile. "For," said he clearly, with his eye fixed on his antagonist, "a real drag-chain is applied only when the machine is going down hill!"
