In the year of 1860 I was playing in a stock company in New Orleans, and the city was wild with rumors of the dawning conflict. As the company was comprised of a number of northern people, many vacancies were created by the deserters who hastened homeward. The first to leave was our leading man, and the manager was anxious to secure a competent successor, who soon presented himself in the shape of a fine Texan, of much repairation among the rabks of amateurs.
