There are several common troubles of young pigs which breeders find it difficult to explain or cure. The first f these which we desire to speak of 'aphtha" and the cause is usually derangement of the digestive organs. For instance if the brood sow at once after parturition gives a very full flow of milk to her young the milk will be liable to produce a disturbance and give rise to the disease referred to which is characterized by the appearance of small blisters and uicers within the mouth, upon the tongue, gums and inside of the cheeks. To prevent this and other troubles of the digestive tract the sow should not b fed generously upon grain just prior to farrowing and should be very sparely fed for some days after the pigs
