GENTLE IN HIS CRITICISM. World Would Be Better For More Men

Like Ephraim Farlows.

The shortcomings of his neighbors never troubled Ephraim Farlows. He found so many excuses for them that I seemed in the end as if some but he most ill-natured person would pre sume to mention them in a spirit of riticism

On his farm Mr. Farlows employed the same rose colored glasses which made the views of life so pleasant to his gentle eyes.

"Kind of a roving critter, she is said one day, referring to a cow which had wandered from pasture and le him a chase of several miles. "Seemi to like variety; but I tell ye, it beats all what an eye she's got for sightly spots to locate. Where I found h 'twas so pretty, I declare I telt to praise her for leading me up there."

There was a hen which would have tried the patience of any ordinary beyond the endurance limit, but Mr. Farlowe found a good deal to admire in her.

"She's got ambition beyond any other hen I ever saw," he remarked one day, as he followed the hen's hasty exit from the parlor. "Stands to reason there's something out of the common in a hen that'll start in to an egg in my Sunday hat. Course men an additional furlough, making I had to shoo her out of it, but I don't know as I blame her any.
