LANSING WALTONS
HEAR ABOUT BASS

Methods of propagating bass were described in a letter to the Lansing Journal by Fred A. Wintermeyer. Experiments done on his farm near Salt River and Pitkin indicate that the best method of propagation is by releasing fingerlings into ponds and lakes. He further states that any bass that is caught in the pond or lake should not be kept more than one year, if possible. Wintermeyer claims that if the bass are caught at the first year of life, they will continue to grow so rapidly that they will be ready for the market by the time they are two years old.

Dr. H. E. Battersby, professor of agriculture at the University of Michigan, states that the best method of propagating bass is by releasing fingerlings into ponds and lakes. The professor states that bass are a game fish and that they are not suitable for food. He further states that the best method of propagation is by releasing fingerlings into ponds and lakes. Preserving Fruits by Freezing

By HAROLD B. TUCKER

FREEZING feeds fresh fruits is one of the most popular new developments in the fruit industry. The method is simple and easy to do, and it is now being used by many farmers in the United States. The method is based on the principle that freezing kills the microorganisms that cause decay. By freezing fruits, the microorganisms are destroyed and the fruits remain fresh for a long time.

The method is especially adapted to fruits that are grown in the northern parts of the United States, where the growing season is short and the fruits are not grown in large quantities. In the southern parts of the United States, where the growing season is long and the fruits are grown in large quantities, the method is not as successful.

In the long run, it has been found that the fruits that are grown in the northern parts of the United States are better preserved by freezing than are the fruits that are grown in the southern parts of the United States.

The pack is made with and without a wide variety of fruit filling.
