One of the Michigan county seats in the early days returns to its old capitol city status through the establishment of a cooperative-aera forest area at Custer. The state department of conservation has acquired title to over 1,600 acres of land in the area, and a cooperative forest management program is being established. The area is located in the Upper Peninsula, and the forest is expected to provide valuable timber resources.

State Deeds Land to Conservation Dept.

Through deeds from the state to the county, a total of over 1,600 acres of land has been transferred to the state for establishment of a cooperative forest area. This acquisition is part of the state's efforts to conserve and manage forest resources for public benefit.

Why It Pays to Produce WINTER EGGS

Why it pays to produce winter eggs for the market. A winter egg is one that is produced during the winter months. These eggs are preferred by consumers because they are fresher and more nutritious than those produced during the summer months. The demand for winter eggs is high, and producers who are able to supply them can earn a good profit. In addition, winter eggs are easier to store and transport than summer eggs, which allows for better distribution and increased sales.

A monthly summary of the Michigan Department of Agriculture, including figures on all types of livestock, shows that the state's livestock industry continues to grow. The state's cattle and hog numbers have increased significantly, and the number of hens and layers of chickens has also increased.

Specialist Explains Benefit of Herd Testing

"Michigan dairymen have added $1,000,000 to their income in the past year by testing their herds," said J. M. Martin, State supervisor of dairy herd testing. "The benefits of herd testing are numerous and include improved milk production, increased fertility, and reduced disease problems."

When Food Sours

This is a page from a comic strip called "Jack and Jill" by Clifford Webb. The strip humorously captures everyday situations with a twist of satire and irony. The text is a collection of short stories or events, each told in a humorous and exaggerated manner, typical of early 20th-century comic strips. The artwork and style are indicative of the period, with intricate details and a playful tone.

The strip involves characters such as "Jack" and "Jill," who are often caught in amusing predicaments or behave in peculiar ways. For instance, one panel shows Jack and Jill in a garden, where Jack is trying to convince Jill that he can control the weather, suggesting a humorous take on meteorology.

The visual elements include exaggerated expressions, unlikely scenarios, and whimsical settings, all designed to entertain and amuse the audience of the time. The style is lively and engaging, with a focus on absurdity and absurd situations that were popular in comic strips during that era.

Overall, the page provides a glimpse into the humor and wit of early comic strip culture, characterized by its playful approach to everyday life and the use of exaggerated situations to entertain readers.
