NOBODY KNOWS BUT MOTHER

How many wars have you been in, Sallie? I haven't been in any war, but I know there are many people who have.

How many children and how many grandchildren have you had, Mary? I've had three children and six grandchildren.

How many times have you sold your house and moved, Hannah? I've only sold my house once and moved twice.

How many friends do you have, Abigail? I don't have many friends, but I have a few who are very dear to me.

NOURISHING THE MIND IN 1865

NOBODY KNOWS BUT MOTHER

People called him "Handsome Henry." He was tall and lanky, with a broad nose and charming smile. He was a day walking along with the head banding in the streets of town. Nobody spoke to him, but did he care? He was too busy walking around and stacking the books to notice. A red and white flag was staked round his neck, and a few people looked at him as if he were some sort of the matter which nobody really cared about.

The next day, the same activity was repeated. Nobody asked him why or how. He was just another day walking.

"Will you come here with me and have your supper?"

"Not tonight, Patsy," he replied. "I have other plans."

"Oh, do come. I have something special for you."

"I can't. I have to go."

"But I have something for you."

"I can't. I have a meeting."

"I have a surprise for you."

"I have a friend coming."

"I have a promise to keep."

"I have a book to read."

His name was Benjamin N. Forrest, and he was one of the first African American lawyers in the United States.

She must have been in her thirties, with a kind face and gentle demeanor. She was wearing a simple black dress and carried a small bag in her hand.

"I would have been there, except that I was busy with another case."

"Oh, I see."

"Yes, I'm a lawyer. I have to work."

"I understand."

"I'm glad you do."

She sat down next to him and took his hand. "I've been thinking," she said. "Would you like to work with me?"

"With you?"

"Yes, I've been thinking about it," she continued. "I've been reading your cases and I think you are quite talented."

"Thank you," he replied. "I'm flattered."

"I've been seeing a lot of your work and I think you could be a great asset to the firm."

"I would be honored," he said. "I would love to work with you."

"I know," she said. "I've been thinking of it for a long time."
