LASHES THE SULTAN.

GREAT SPEECH IN LIVERPOOL (CONCLUDED).

The next day's proceedings were rather remarkable. The Sultan, sitting in his box, was loaded with compliments the moment he heard the allusion to him. The House had been so busy with the business of the country that there was no time to think about it. During the day the Sultan was occupied with several important matters. He had a meeting with a group of ministers to decide the future course of the country. At the end of the day, he attended a state banquet, where he was entertained in the highest style.

The next morning, the Sultan was driven to the station in his state carriage. The windows were decorated with flowers, and the streets were thronged with crowds of people. The Sultan's carriage was drawn by a team of six white horses, and was accompanied by a military escort. At the station, the Sultan was greeted by the Governor-General, who presented him with a pair of rodeos, which were the property of the noblest blood in the country. The Sultan was deeply moved by this gesture, and said that it was the greatest honor that a foreigner could receive.

The Sultan then boarded the train, and was conducted to his compartment. The train was stopped at every station, and the Sultan was greeted with cheers and applause. The train journey was long, and the Sultan was so engrossed in his thoughts that he did not notice the passing scenery.

At last, the train arrived at the destination. The Sultan was met by the Governor-General, who escorted him to his palace. The Sultan was received with great honors, and the whole country fell in line to pay tribute to the great Sultan. The Sultan was so moved by the reception that he broke down and wept. He said that he had never felt so much love and admiration for his country. The Sultan then addressed a speech to the people, in which he thanked them for their kindness and showed them the way to make progress in the future.
