

I have taken a keen interest in the tactics and spin that the radical so-called environmentalists have used to communicate with the citizens of our nation. It is hard to determine if it is centrally controlled or if it is the work of many different factions coming from different directions.

At the Poa Annua we had a very informative program that David Court put together. The first three hours of the program were a lesson in media relations, put on by Dow Elanco's Issues Manager, Terry Henderson. The program was interesting and timely. The last hour and a half, the class engaged in a lively panel discussion on the media. The panel consisted of three reporters from the southwest Florida area. One of the reporters was from a local television station, another reporter covered local news for a local paper and the other person was a local sportswriter. All three of the reporters felt that they were fair and that they tried to explore both sides of an issue before they wrote or aired a story.

Many superintendents in the class had horror stories of misquotations and misrepresentations. Others did have positive stories of how they were properly portrayed. This brings me to my point, which is that everyone has a particular view and many people are not going to change.

Have you ever had an employee who you felt was not carrying his share of the work? I have. Every time that I would confront one of these people, they would respond by telling me that they are one of the hardest workers on the staff, and I should look at others who they felt did not carry a fair share. I have found the same to be true with environmentalists and media. I recently wrote a letter to the editor of an well-known environmentalist magazine to dispute the slant they gave golf courses in one of their articles. I do not know if it was published (I doubt it), but I did get a reply. The reply was the same untruths and environmentalist packaging that they give many anti-golf stories. I have seen enough of it that I can recognize it by now. My letter had no effect on the individual, and his basic reply was, "the fact that golf is doing environmentally favorable things proves that it was hurting the environment in the first place."

In the May 1 edition of Sports Illustrated, in the Scorecard section, an article was written regarding the 25th anniversary of Earth Day. The first question that I had was why that magazine was doing this story in the first place.

The story lambasted the new Republican Congress and, oddly enough, the Clinton Administration, for its lack of movement in the environmental fields. What frustrates me with stories like that is that no credit is given to what has been done.

The mindset seems to be that the sky is falling, and everything that is done just makes our world worse. The environmentalists seem to take no credit, nor do they give any credit, for things improving. The environmental movement has been responsible for many major victories and some have been positive.

In the past 25 years, we have seen the creation of the EPA at national and state levels, the Clean Water Act, and the Clean Air Act, as well as the recycling of water, plastic, paper, metal and other materials. The movement has been, in my opinion, partly responsible for the movement of American factories and job out of our country, thus resulting in a lowering of living standards.

You may view some of the things listed above as positive or negative, but either way the environmentalist movement has affected all of our lives. I feel that they do not want to admit that any of that is true, and they would rather keep playing David vs. Goliath and making America think that they are a small group, a faint voice in the wilderness, trying to save America and mankind from itself.

We cannot rest on our current position that seems kinder to us than in the past. Many environmental laws are restrictive and cumbersome, but we have learned to work with them and accept the costs. Some laws were necessary, and 25 years ago we had some very polluted waters and air. Much of that has been cleaned up to safer levels, and we need to question where the happy medium is.

The doomsdayers are never going to go away, and we will never change their minds. The best that we can hope for is to get the people in the middle to our side. Many people are more skeptical of the environmentalists as they see costs associated with the environment going up and they see business handcuffed with regulations.

Keep informing people and doing positive things for our industry. Be judicious in your chemical and fertilizer usage. We can improve our situation, but it takes all of us.

This is the last of my President's Messages. I hope that you enjoyed them or that the messages at least made you think of our industry. After this past season, I think that it is evident that we all need to stick together and help each other out.

Thank you for letting me serve, as I have truly enjoyed it. Support Greg as you have me. Thanks to Marie, Paul, Greg, Dale, Kevin, Donnie, Debbie, Joe, Joel and my staff. 🍷
