

Improvements possible for annual show

All of us have opinions and suggestions pertaining to the recent International Golf Course Show in Las Vegas. I'd like to share a few thoughts with you.

Show attendance was excellent. In addition to the large number of superintendents, I noticed an increased number of builders, club management executives and golf course architects.

The builders' dinner honoring Don Rossi was a tribute to a good friend of many, and especially the game of golf.

I was displeased with the convention facilities and the head-quarter hotel. Conference management should be more concerned with the facility. Once again, I'll recommend taking a tip from the Professional Golfers Association and locking into the best facility in the country — the Orlando Convention Center.

Charles von Brecht

I found four positive aspects of Las Vegas:

1. The cab drivers.
2. The Desert Inn.
3. The Desert Inn Golf Course.
4. Piero's Restaurant.

I'm sure Shadow Creek would be on the list had I the opportunity to visit. All in all, in my opinion, Las Vegas does not have much to offer.

I had the opportunity to play golf with two of our advertising clients on Wednesday following the show. We were joined by the Western regional sales manager for a major marine manufacturer, who was in Las Vegas for a boat show.

As we discussed how upbeat and positive our show had been, our golf companion from the marine industry could only shake his head, envious of the continued growth in the golf course industry.

Aren't we fortunate to be in this business?

COMMENTARY

Document and file: It could save a fortune

It's a menace that is clogging the courts, scaring business owners and homeowners alike, enticing and/or infuriating insurance companies, challenging industry... and now it has invaded the world of golf. It's court suits—a major new industry, born largely of greed, and oftentimes perfected in malice.

Money's great. We use it to pay the bills, buy groceries, go to the theater. But the love of money is the root of all evil. It's a root that has taken hold in American society to the extent that, hey, Bud, the front steps to your house had better be well lighted or someone might fall and sue you for the injuries they sustain. Judging by court rulings of the past several years as this suit-craziness has gained momentum, you could lose your house.

So, a person innocently enters the greens-keeping business thinking it is a safe job. Nobody bothers you and you don't bother anybody — except the grubs and other pests attacking your course.

Sorry to disappoint you, but now you've got to watch out for the ground water investigators, the bird watchers, the underground storage tank authorities, the people walking their dog on your 9th fairway, and a slew of others.

Meanwhile, your club manager can be checking out which insurance coverages to buy — for himself, his employees, the club directors. He can look into environmental insurance. And now, hot from The Irrigation Association, there's irrigation system insurance.

Mark Leslie

How do you safeguard yourself?

The message at the 62nd International Golf Course Conference and Show was painfully clear at several sessions. It was as if speakers had gotten hold of advance copies of each others' scripts.

Their message: Document, document, document!

If some neighborhood children wander onto your course and you warn them to leave — for whatever reason, be it protection from the pool or flying golf balls — write down the instance and file it, file it, file it.

When you teach your crew about the spray equipment, record it, then file it.

There's a huge difference between having only a verbal defense and having documentation when you appear in court.

This pertains not only to superintendents and club managers. Architects and developers now have to look over their shoulders, and watch closely how their subcontractors are doing their jobs.

Arnold Palmer found that out at his home course in Florida.

Now Jack Nicklaus has discovered the same thing in Breckenridge, Colo.

Two famous and wealthy men were sued. Two questionable decisions were made in court.

Were they lacking the documentation that could have saved them as architects and golf course builders? I don't know.

But I do know this: There's a sickness pervading society with these suits, and just a little extra care can save a person hundreds of thousands of dollars down the road.

Anyone already caught by society's culprit of the 1980s won't forget it; the rest of us would be wise to heed it.

GUEST COMMENTARY

Superintendent-pro relationship critical

By Ken Flisek

One of the most important ingredients in any successful golf facility is the relationship between the superintendent and the golf professional. It seems, however, that more times than not friction exists between the two.

This makes the job of both more difficult, and often results in one of both eventually being replaced. Generally, the problems can be easily avoided.

The cornerstone to a successful working relationship is mutual personal and professional respect. Both people are equally important to the success of the operation, and should therefore view each other as equals. (The only people more important to the success of the course are the golfers themselves.)

Although they have separate roles within the club or company, the success of one depends on the performance of the other. The superintendent works behind the scenes preparing the course to its finest possible conditions for upcoming events.

The pro takes care of the administrative details and advance work to make sure the event runs smoothly.

It generally takes two different types of personalities and mentalities to perform these critical functions. Neither is more or less important to the success of a tournament or outing, or of the entire golf operation. Once the pro and superintendent have agreed on this fundamental principle, they are well on their way toward a successful and enjoyable working relationship.

They must respect each other's expertise, while also knowing exactly what the other does. One way to accomplish this is for the superintendent to spend time in the pro shop observing how the pro deals with the golfing public.

I always get a kick out of standing anonymously in the corner of the pro shop listening to the pro answer questions that should be directed toward me. It doesn't take long to realize I don't have the patience to do his job as well as he does.

Ken Flisek

The pro should also spend time on the course with the superintendent to get a feel for the many aspects of course maintenance. Just being seen on the course together shows a sense of teamwork. This feeling of equality and respect will soon be picked up by the membership, making the job of both more rewarding and satisfying.

There are other basic, yet often overlooked, ways for these two professionals to work with each other instead of in spite of each other:

- As in any successful relationship, there must be an open and two-way line of communication.

There should be an early-morning conversation to discuss any events to be held that day, the anticipated amount of play, weather conditions and any out-of-the-ordinary maintenance practices planned. Whenever possible, they should also meet around lunch-time to see if there will be an influx of unexpected play or unforeseen problems that have arisen on the course. Meeting informally during lunch has always helped me and the pros I have worked with.

Just as important, there should be at least a monthly meeting between the pro and superintendent to discuss upcoming events. By comparing schedules well in advance, conflicts with each other's schedule or plans can be minimized.

Whenever possible, the superintendent should work with the pro and golf committee in setting up the tournament schedule for the following year. Without this group effort, conflicts usually are not discovered until after the schedule has been printed and mailed.

- Superintendents are usually reluctant to admit it, but the pro is the important link between the superintendent and the golfing public. Because of his high visibility and close proximity to the 18th

Continued on page 20

Publisher
Charles E. von Brecht

Editorial Director
Brook Taliaferro

Managing Editor
Mark A. Leslie

Associate Editor
Peter Blais

Contributing Editors
Kit Bradshaw
Vern Putney
Bob Spiwak

Editorial Advisory Board
William Bengueyfield
Dr. Michael Hurdzan
Hurdzan Design Group
James McLoughlin
The McLoughlin Group
Brent Wadsworth
Wadsworth Construction

Production Manager
Joline A. Violette

Circulation Manager
Nicole Carter

Editorial Office
Golf Course News
PO Box 997
38 Lafayette Street
Yarmouth, ME 04096
(207) 846-0600

Advertising Office
National Sales:
Charles E. von Brecht

Marketplace Sales:
Simone M. Lewis

Golf Course News
7901 Fourth St. North
Suite 311
St. Petersburg, FL 33702
(813) 576-7077

West Coast Sales
Wayne Roche
James G. Elliott Co.
714 W. Olympic Blvd.
Suite 1120
Los Angeles, CA 90015
(213) 746-8800

United Publications, Inc.
Publishers of specialized business and consumer magazines

Chairman
Theodore E. Gordon
President
J.G. Taliaferro, Jr.

NGF
NATIONAL GOLF FOUNDATION
Sponsor
Member

BPA

Copyright © 1991 by United Publications, Inc. All rights reserved and reproduction, in whole or in part, without written permission from the publisher is expressly prohibited. POSTMASTER: Send address changes to Circulation Manager, Golf Course News, P.O. Box 1347, Elmhurst, IL 61026-8347.