New group fights for the right to walk

By J. BARRY MOTHES

WASHINGTON, D.C. — It's a classic golf story for these times. A story with legs.

Graham Whatley, a former Clinton administration appointee now working as a consultant, has launched the Walking Golfer's Association to promote and advocate the rights of golfers who prefer to walk while they play. The non-profit association will fight to keep walking an essential part of the game of golf.

"This is political movement in the golf world," said Whatley, a 39-year-old attorney who plays to a 12 handicap — while walking — at his local course, the Redgate Municipal Golf Course in Rockville, Md. "We're quite serious about this."

The idea of a walking golfer's association would have seemed ridiculous 30 or 40 years ago — and might still seem so in most parts of the world where walking golfers dominate. But golf in the United States in the late 1990s is another matter. The industry's heavy reliance of golf cart rentals to increase golf course revenues and the growing number of golf courses in the United States that force golfers to rent and ride carts has led to a grass-roots resentment among those who prefer to walk when they play golf.

Whatley decided to launch the Walking Golfer's Association after running into a situation that has become commonplace in the last 10 or so years — mandatory carts and cart fees, especially at the increasing number of high-end, upscale, daily-fee courses.

"There's nothing worse than being forced to take a cart," said Whatley.

Whatley and his partner in the venture, Keith Pickford, are currently working to enlist people from different areas of the game to serve on the WGA's Board of Directors. One of the first to sign on is golf course architect Dr. Michael Hurdzan.

"I really think walking a golf course is an essential part of golf," said Hurdzan, who grew up caddying, then later became superintendent at a public course in Columbus, Ohio, where walking was a natural part of the game.

"I think the game is more enjoyable when you walk, with the fairway under your feet, the jangling of the clubs, the conversation with the people you're playing with. We've become addicted to golf cars and financially dependent on golf cars. I'm really bothered when people say the only way to run a profitable golf course is to rent golf cars. Golf is too great a game to be hostage to anything."

According to Whatley, the new Walking Golfer's Association has three short-term goals:

— work for revisions in the official rules of golf to include wording that states every golfer has the right to walk his or her round of golf. This proposed change would probably be targeted for Rule 1-1, which states, "The Game of Golf consists in playing a ball from a teeing ground into the hole by a stroke or successive strokes in accordance with the Rules." Whatley would like to see another sentence or two along the lines of, "walking is an integral part of the game of golf and no golfer should be denied the right to walk."

— provide advocacy services to its members by writing letters and sending informational packets to golf courses that restrict or ban walking to encourage them to allow walking.

— create a web-site and a working directory of golf courses that allow walking.

The WGA will also work to educate the golfing community on the benefits of walking, such as physical health, social interaction, and speed of play. Whatley pointed out that in Britain, a typical round of golf played by four walking golfers each playing their own ball takes about 3 hours.
