Time to give Europe a look

I promise not to yammer on about the Textron/Ransomes deal again in this column until something else actually happens. I'll quickly bring you up to date and move along.

As most of you know by now, Textron has taken the British mower company under its wing (see cover story) and early plans are to keep the brand names in the spotlight. According to Carl Bartlett, new president of Textron's golf equipment group, redundant products will be trimmed and Jacobsen and Ransomes technologies will be pieced together. We'll report more as news comes in.

We've been receiving a number of calls in the editorial office about the situation in Asia. Our contacts tell us that virtually every current Asian development, with the exception of Southern China (see Asian Notebook, page 12), has been put on hold indefinitely.

Course designers are cutting back on staff (see cover story on Gary Player Enterprises and the Q&A with Ross Watson on page 45) but keeping a foot in the door. Watson, an Australian architect who has recently seen a few of his projects stalled, has winnowed his Malaysian staff of six down to one. That person will man the phone. There is no firm prediction at this stage in the game as to how or when the Asian market will get back on its feet — yet most industry players are certain that it will come back stronger, smarter, better.

My prediction is that development deals will abound, international management companies will grow, player development programs will slowly ramp up, construction costs will be to reasonable levels, clubhouse development will become more modest and there will be less dependence on real estate development and more emphasis on the stand-alone, public course. Did I mention a move toward better site selection? Does this sound familiar?

In the meantime, tourism is picking up due to deregulation of the currency. It is possible that the leisure market, the market that many are blaming for the current calamity, will be just the thing to put the region back on its feet.

While we wait out an Asian recovery it may be time to give Europe a look. On page 3, Dr. Falk Billson, a German golf course management consultant and one of our top European contacts, gives us a country-by-country look at the current European golf course market. Billson's piece, along with Andy Overbeck's notebook on the Chinese market, are required reading this month.

Robin Hood attitude holds true

Those in golf have long said it is a noble sport played by noble men and women — honorable, great-minded people. In what other sport would a competitor make a judgment against himself upon discovering he had unknowingly violated a rule of the game? Where else do the best amateurs (A.K.A. Bobby Jones) turn aside from the promise of wealth to the professional ranks? Where else do participants honor and defer to tradition to the extent that golfers do?

While courts, lawyers and the general public squabbled about Casey Martin's suit against the PGA Tour — often damning the sport's hierarchy at every chance — many involved in the industry itself were looking forward in great anticipation to donating their talents, money and help to youth sports and minorities around the country join the community of golfers. It has to be heartening to see course architects, builders, developers — and just plain golf lovers — jump at the opportunity to help those who wouldn't otherwise be able to play this sport-of-a-lifetime.

Brent Wadsworth, president of Wadsworth Golf Construction Co., has established the Wadsworth Golf Foundation to get inner-city youths off the streets and into a sport that can change their outlook on life. (See story page 49).

In Boise, Idaho, developer HansGeorg "Hans" Barsbonus is planning a Robin Hood Executive Course as part of his 54-hole Cleverdale Golf Project (see page 45). He wants to rob the rich (from the North and South courses) and give to the poor (the Robin Hood course), thus subsidizing green fees "to any junior who wants to play." (See story page 49). The Minority Golf Association of America is developing a facility in Chicago, "teaching professionals, develop special programs and activities to support allied organizations such as the PGA, and train aspiring minority golfers. The academy plans to house 30 to 35 people.

The National Association of Junior Golfers (NAJG) has been uniting corporations with junior golf programs and organizations across the country, serving as the network for junior golf and corporate marketing efforts. (See page 51).

The United States Golf Association, PGA and LPGA, among others, are supporting junior golf programs from coast to coast. Witness the First Tee Program founded by the World Golf Foundation. Organized just last November, it plans to have 100 courses in the program in two years, making golf available to minority and junior golfers.

Many architects — including Lester George, Mike Hurdzan, Jim Rich and others — are ready to offer their services to First Tee-type projects.

The American Society of Golf Course Architects has already given its first-ever President's Grant to the Georgia State Golf Foundation for its Hook A Kid on Golf Program. The $5,000 grant will underwrite activities and equipment for underprivileged youths this summer.

Honorable? Noble? Great-minded? I think we can find little argument here. And we congratulate all those who are adding their time and fortunes to the cause.

In the meantime, some can go overboard in their zealously

ASIAN NOTEBOOK: CHINA

Chinese golf course market remains on steady rise

By ANDREW OVERBECK

SHANGHAI, China — Amidst all of the economic turmoil in Asia, China has quietly emerged as a steady and reliable market for the golf course industry. While golf course investment in the rest of Asia is grinding to a halt, China's golf market continues to grow.

In the past two months I have had the opportunity to visit some of these new projects and to assess the strength of the local markets.

China has attracted a diverse group of investors, mostly from countries that have sizable overseas Chinese populations. The single largest group of investors is from Hong Kong — with Malaysians, Singaporeans, and even local Chinese firms entering the arena. There is a massive rush for these investors to have the prestige of having the biggest, the best, and the first of anything.

Therefore, projects are immense in scale, diverse in location, and have outlandish features. However, the bottom line remains that in order to be successful, the developers must take into account the ability of the local market to sustain the growth.

For the middle of the 80s, the golf market in this area has exploded: new courses continue to emerge and the diversity of the investors has moved past the usual Hong Kong money flow.

The Agile Holdings Golf and Country Club in Zhongshan, China, is a case in point. This is the largest golf course in the country, active in the housing development business for many years. In fact, they practically built the entire town of
